whether resignations had not taken place in Roman Catholic times, under the rule of the Pope, but he thought their Lordships would feel that, considering the effect of the resignation would be to remove from their Lordships' House two of its most distinguished members, and they could find no precedent for so doing, it would have been exceedingly unwise for the Government to proceed in such a matter without the consent of Parliament. There being the difficulty he had stated with regard to the general measure, there came the question how to deal with these exceptional cases. The revenue received by the Bishop of London being £18,000, while the income of the bishopric was fixed at £10,000, there would be no difficulty in providing a handsome allowance for the retiring Bishop. So again in the case of the Bishop of Durham; although he was a "regulated" Bishop, ample provision could be made for that right rev. Prelate out of the surplus revenues of the see. The Government thought there would have been reason to complain if, after such an intimation, they had remained passive spectators of the state of their dioceses. The Government had, therefore, introduced a Bill, which he asked their Lordships now to read a second time, and which relieved these two Prelates, according to the wish they had expressed, from duties which they were unequal to discharge. A charge upon the revenues of their sees would be created, which would, however, in each case leave a surplus for the Ecclesiastical Fund. It had, he believed, been contended that this sanction on the part of Parliament was of a simoniacal character, since it was, as it were, bribing these two Prelates to retire by offering them handsome allowances for so doing. This, however, amounted to saying that there were to be no episcopal resignations, unless the Bishop were prepared to resign without having the means of support for the rest of his life; which would be equivalent to saying that there was to be no resignation at all. The Bishop of London would retire upon £6,000 a year. With the respect which he felt for that right rev. Prelate it was extremely painful to him to discuss this subject. He had not heard the circumstance he was about to mention from the right rev. Prelate's own mouth, but he had been assured, and had no doubt of the fact, that the right rev. Prelate had never saved any money, except that he had insured his life largely. This necessarily meant that to the end of life the person assuring must pay large sums to keep up these insurances: so that the Bishop of London could not retire without making provision for keeping up these payments; and he was informed that about one thousand a year would be exhausted in keeping up the insurances which he had properly effected for the support of his wife and family. He thought that no one would object to the amount of the retiring allowance if the principle were admissible. He knew that any resignation of a benefice must be accompanied by a declaration that there had been no corrupt bargain. But would any one contend that it was a corrupt bargain when a person receiving £18,000 a year—which he might, if he chose, continue to receive without doing anything for it—expressed his willingness to give it up if he were enabled to live in comfort for the rest of his life? He could not conceive anything less open to the imputation of a corrupt bargain than such a surrender; and the same remark applied to the resignation of the Bishop of Durham. He knew that such an arrangement would not be tolerated in the case of a beneficed clergyman, who by the statute of Elizabeth was obliged to resign his benefice without receiving any consideration. But it would not be contended that what was done by an act of the Legislature could not be altered by Parliament when the occasion required. It was also alleged that the form of this Bill was not such as to be respectful to these right rev. Prelates. It could not be supposed that any disrespect was intended on the part of the Government; but it was said, that, although they had expressed their desire to resign their sees, the enactment declared that the sees had become vacant, when it ought to have declared them vacant upon their resigning. The Government, however, had no objection to introduce in Committee words to the effect that the Bishops should be held to have resigned upon resigning their sees to the Metropolitan, and upon their resignation being accepted by him. Anything that the right rev. Bench might suggest upon this subject would be adopted without hesitation by the Government. He had now to ask their Lordships to give a second reading to this Bill.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2^d.

LORD REDESDALE said, on the best consideration he could give the measure, and he had considered it attentively, the only conclusion that he could come to was, that it was not expedient for the House to allow it to pass a second reading. The question was one of very great importance, and it was better that the short delay should occur which would be necessary for framing a general measure on the subject than that by adopting the present exceptional measure they should establish a dangerous precedent. The more facilities the two cases under consideration presented for a settlement, the greater was the danger as regarded a general measure in respect to future settlements; and he did not think the Legislature ought to act exceptionally in such a case. He was not opposed to the principle of retirements, but he could not help seeing its inconvenience in the case before the House, inasmuch as if it were adopted in the instance of Bishops, it would also, on the footing of justice, have to be adopted in the case of rectors, and, indeed, to be extended to the clergy generally. He could see no reason why an infirm Rector should not be enabled to retire as well as an infirm Bishop. The particular case in question came before the House, moreover, in a manner which the House should, in his opinion, hesitate to sanction. Here were two Bishops who placed their sees at the disposal of the Minister, upon condition that he made certain arrangements for their retiring allowances. Now, these were two sees, the occupants of which had seats in their Lordships' House immediately upon their appointment. There might be persons who would object, that the nomination to these bishopricks should be placed in the hands of the present Ministry. He (Lord Redesdale) was far from entertaining any such political jealousy; but the House would have to consider how far the political argument bore upon the subject. It was dangerous to admit the principle of separate dealing with the question, therefore, as it admitted of the imputation of motives. The noble and learned Lord (the Lord Chancellor) had said that there was no objection to making an alteration in the wording of the measure which would make the Bill express that the sees only became vacant on the resignation of the two right rev. Prelates; and, therefore, he (Lord Redesdale) would make no remark on that point further than to observe, that the admitted necessity of the alteration showed the misfortune of introducing a measure of such importance in the hurried manner in which this Bill had been brought forward. There were one or two points of the measure which he would rather avoid discussing; but those points deeply affected the interests of the Church, and he could not allow any personal sensibility to preclude him from speaking out upon these matters. He entertained the highest respect for both the right rev. Prelates whom this Bill affected. He was on terms of personal acquaintance with both. He had a more intimate acquaintance with the Bishop of London, and no person could entertain a higher respect for that Prelate than he did. He was aware that no Bishop who had ever held the see of London had devoted the whole of his energies more unceasingly or with more success to the duties of the episcopate than had the Bishop of London. He believed that no Prelate who had ever held the see of London had to a greater extent promoted the spiritual good of those whom he presided over than the present Bishop. But this only induced him (Lord Redesdale) to express the deeper regret at the circumstances which had attended that Prelate's proposed resignation; and he believed that if all the facts were brought under the Bishop's consideration, and that he were afforded an opportunity of deliberately giving them his attention, he would, after having done so, regret the fact of the present Bill being on their Lordships' table as much as he (Lord Redesdale) should himself. He would shortly direct their Lordships' attention to what had already been done by way of legislation on the subject of resignations of church livings. Before the time of the Reformation, arrangements with regard to the resignation of spiritual benefices were common; and those arrangements included the granting of pensions or allowances out of the incomes of the livings. These arrangements gave rise to very great abuses; and by an Act passed in the 26th year of the reign of Henry VIII. it was provided that unlimited pensions should no longer be granted, and reservation was made that the amount of pension should not exceed one-third of the amount of the benefice. Notwithstanding this enactment, abuses were, he presumed, still found to arise; for in the 36th of Eliz. an Act was passed which rendered the making of any arrangements at all of that kind unlawful, that Act declaring that all such arrangements with respect to benefices should be considered corrupt in the eye of the law, and imposing a penalty amounting to double the amount of the stipulated pension upon any party negotiating to receive such pension. Now, their Lordships would bear in mind that that Act was in existence at the present time, when the negotiation with respect to the sees of London and Durham was being carried on by the Government, notwithstanding that such negotiations were in direct violation of it. If they intended to do away with the statute of Elizabeth they ought to do so by a general Act declaring that, notwithstanding that enactment, such negotiations should be legal; but so long as the statute of Elizabeth existed a negotiation like that the subject of this special Bill was illegal. For this reason he thought, then, that their Lordships ought to discountenance the proposed measure. Another objection he had to the Bill—and it was one which it was extremely painful to touch upon—was, that he thought the amount of the retiring pensions excessive. He said this with extreme regret; but they should remember that they were establishing a precedent, and one which was, in his opinion, an objectionable and dangerous one. Let them recollect what arrangements of this kind ought to be under any circumstances. They ought not to be in any way in the light of bargains. There ought to be nothing of this kind. Men should not say, "Here is a see; I will resign it if you give me so much. I will not if you don't." The simple arrangement ought to be that a Bishop wishing to resign his see, should say, "I am incapable of longer performing the duties which my office imposes upon me, and I wish to resign. Give me enough to live upon—that is all I require." If it were conceded that such should be the guiding principle in these arrangements, then the question arose, upon what scale ought those retiring pensions to be regulated? Surely there ought to be some regulated scale. What scale had been adopted in the cases now before the House? Why, the smaller of those proposed pensions was larger than the income considered necessary for a Bishop in the full performance of his duties. The smaller pension—that proposed for the Bishop of Durham—was £4,500 a year, while the larger was £6,000. Yet, except in the case of the Prelates who might be called the three premier Bishops, the income of the acting Bishops ranged from £4,200 to £4,500 a year, none of them exceeding the latter sum. He had no hesitation in saying that this arrangement was of the character of a bargain and partook of a simoniacal character. He thought, therefore, that he was justified in saying that the scale of pension, for which this Bill would set a precedent, was an objectionable one, and that, if adopted, it would throw difficulties in the way of future arrangements. On the whole he believed that it was most desirable that this Bill should be withdrawn. The discussion of this measure in detail, though most painful to their Lordships, might in its results prove most useful; but he thought that the principle of the present Bill could not be defended, and under these circumstances he felt it his duty to move that it be read a second time that day three months.

Amendment moved, to leave out "now," and insert "this day three months."

THE EARL OF CHICHESTER said, he could not do justice to his feelings without adding his testimony to the merits of the right rev. Prelate the Bishop of London, to his great ability, his great learning, and the urbanity of conduct which he had always displayed. He had had personal and official communication with him in many transactions, and he was therefore competent to bear witness to his worth as a Christian Minister, and the liberal and munificent manner in which he dispensed the large income of his see. It was not beyond the truth to say that the whole of that income, above the necessary provision for his family, had been devoted to the Church. He might speak in the same terms of the liberality of the other right rev. Prelate, who—though it was no doubt true, that he had received a larger income than had been contemplated by the Act of Parliament—had not only paid over £2,000 per annum to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, for the erection of parsonage-houses for the poorer clergy, but had expended the rest of his surplus income, as he (the Earl of Chichester) happened to know, for the benefit of the Church and charitable institutions in his diocese. When the future Bishops should be appointed under the regulations of the Act of Parliament, the immediate losers would be the poorer clergy, and charitable institutions of the two dioceses. With respect to the Bill itself, he should only observe that he regarded the retiring allowances proposed to be granted, as only reasonable and proper. He would now make some observations on the objections of his noble Friend opposite. His noble Friend had first stated that the only proper remedy for such cases was a general measure. Now, he (the Earl of Chichester) agreed that if it were possible it would be better to pass a general measure to regulate the retirement of Bishops. This would be much more satisfactory. But a general measure not only involved difficulties requiring mature consideration, but from the nature of the case could not apply to the exceptional circumstances of the present retirement. Other retirements ought not to be made on the same terms, because, in a general measure, it would be most unjust to the Church to propose to make such large retiring allowances to those Bishops whose incomes had been regulated by Act of Parliament, and still less to Bishops appointed after the proposed measure. In these cases the allowances should be on a proportionately reduced scale. The main objection to the introduction of a general measure at this time was, that there would be no time to discuss it. Some persons wished that a general Act should be passed, rendering retirement in certain cases compulsory. It was argued that a Prelate too infirm to perform his duties might be the very last to be conscious of those infirmities. Now, he thought compulsory enactments open to great objection. Any Bill which should fix the retirement of Bishops without their own consent required that mature consideration which could not be given to it during the present Session. Upon what principle would it be applied to existing Bishops? The noble Lord had referred to the statute of Elizabeth which prohibited all trafficking in matters relating to benefices in the Church; but that statute had no reference to the present case—it referred only to negotiations between persons holding benefices and their proposed successors. But in the present instance there had been no trafficking, nor even negotiation between parties standing in that relation to each other, nor even between the two Bishops and the Government. He (the Earl of Chichester) had been the organ of communication between one right rev. Prelate and the Government. The right rev. Prelate communicated to him that he felt himself incapacitated from performing the duties of his office, and feared he should never be able to resume them, and was therefore desirous of retiring upon an annuity of £6,000. That was the simple statement made to him, which he communicated to the Government. He believed that the other right rev. Prelate had made a precisely similar communication. With regard to the Bill before their Lordships, considering the meagre pay received by so many clergymen, he should not have felt inclined to approve of the arrangement as a prospective example; but, when they remembered that these two Prelates had entered into possession of these large incomes of £18,000 and £14,000 a year without any notice of their retirement being possible—that they were, in fact, entitled to consider those incomes as secured to them for life—he thought anything short of the pensions now proposed would be unjust. The sums proposed would be paid without any diminution of the income of their successors, and there would moreover be a balance over of £4,000 a year at the disposal of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. In conclusion he might be allowed to remind their Lordships of the very great danger which would arise from a postponement of this measure. Both of these right rev. Prelates had, under their own hands, informed the Government that they were of opinion that they were disqualified from performing their duties as Bishops, and that they were anxious to retire. Would it be right to leave the Church in the two important dioceses of London and Durham, under the care of Prelates who had themselves owned that they were unfit to hold those two important posts? When the Bill came into Committee, he should probably bring an Amendment under the consideration of their Lordships for the purpose of facilitating the future decision of the see of London, a measure which he understood had been for some time under consideration. He might also propose some alteration in the mode in which the sees should be declared vacant; but he should certainly give his vote in favour of the second reading of the present Bill.

THE DUKE OF CLEVELAND said, he was surprised that some general measure on this subject had not been brought in before. He thought there could be no doubt that, when Bishops were incapacitated by infirmity or illness from attending to their duties, they ought to be enabled to retire, and ample provision ought to be made for them on their retirement. The only question was, what should be the amount of their pensions? Now, he was quite aware that this question was surrounded by great difficulties, but in his opinion the pensions should certainly vary in proportion to the value of the sees, and to the incomes which the right rev. Prelates had enjoyed. With regard to the Bishop of Durham, he could say, from long residence within that see, and from his own personal knowledge, that a better, a more conscientious, a more charitable, and benevolent Prelate never sat on the episcopal bench; and, so far from agreeing with the noble Lord who had proposed this Amendment, that the pension proposed in his case was too much, he (the Duke of Cleveland) thought it was too little. Although, therefore, he did not object to this Bill, and meant to vote for the second reading, he should certainly move in Committee to raise the pension to the Bishop of Durham from £4,500 to £6,000 a year. When first raised from the see of Chichester to that of Durham, the latter bishopric came under the operation of a new law. It was then suggested that the Bishop of Durham should only have £8,000 a year, but the choice was left to him as to whether he would have a fixed income of that amount, or whether he would keep the revenues of the see, paying to the Treasury the sum of £11,500 a year. The Bishop knew nothing personally of the see or its revenues, but he took an opinion on the subject, the result of which was that he decided to keep the revenues of the see in his own hands, running the chance of what they might amount to for the future, and paying to the Treasury the sum just mentioned. Fortunately for him the revenues of the see increased instead of diminishing; but had the reverse been the case, his income would have been much less than the proposed fixed amount (£8,000). The bargain, therefore, was a perfectly fair one, and was one with respect to which the right rev. Prelate ought not to be assailed, as he had been in the public press, as well as in the other House by the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Horsman). For his own part, he thought that the best plan to pursue would be to place the Bishop of Durham, as regarded a retiring pension, on the same footing as the Bishop of London, for he thought that the one Bishop was as much entitled to a pension of £6,000 a year as the other. It was better in itself to act liberally than to act illiberally, and from the very advanced age of the Bishop of Durham, it was evident that the difference in amount could not be a matter of any great importance. Feeling as he did that both Bishops ought to be placed on the same footing, he would, if he found that he met with any support, submit a Motion to that effect in Committee.

THE BISHOP OF EXETER said, that it was painful to him to have to oppose this Bill. The making a proper provision for the retirement of Bishops was an object which met with his earnest approbation; but he wished that the proposition had been made in another form. He did not then object to the retiring pensions, as proposed—on the contrary, they had his approval—but he must express his surprise that a measure of this kind, affecting the best interests of the Church of England, should have been brought forward without any communication with the Episcopal bench. He said this, because he was quite sure that neither the most rev. Prelate nor any right rev. Prelate would have given their consent to the measure in its present form. That some measure allowing retiring pensions to Bishops should be passed would meet with the approval of every, or almost every Member of their Lordships' House; and he was quite sure that none of the Members of the Episcopal Bench would desire to receive any unreasonable amount of retiring pension when he should become unable to fulfil his episcopal duties. He (the Bishop of Exeter) rejoiced to think that there was already in existence a scale of retiring allowances which might very fairly be applied to retiring Bishops—he meant the pension allowed to Judges under similar circumstances. Certainly their allowances ought not to be less than those given to Judges; and he would carry the matter out, and would say that a difference ought to be made in favour of the two Primates. He thought it would not be unreasonable to make their retiring allowances the same as that of Lord Chancellors.

But while he said this, he must beg to be understood, as altogether dissenting from the notion; that the consideration of money was the main principle involved in the present question. Supposing the Bill to be made unobjectionable, as to the amount of pensions to retiring Bishops, he should still object to it, in its present form, on other and far higher grounds. He objected to it, because of the manner in which the office itself of Bishop was treated by the Bill. That office was there dealt with as if it were the mere creature of the State—it was placing the episcopacy of our Church on the same level as the Episcopacy—if Episcopacy it could be called—of some Protestant State in Germany.

He must also say, that even if this were not the case; if not only the amount of pension assigned to the two retiring Bishops were unexceptionable, but also if in other particulars in respect to them the Bill were satisfactory, he should have much preferred a general measure which should meet the case of all retiring Bishops, to a Bill which was directed only to meet a specific case. Indeed, he had heard no reason why this Bill should not be postponed until such a general measure could be introduced. Sooner or later such a measure must be provided for the case of all Bishops, and, therefore, he thought that the Bill to be introduced should have provided generally for the necessities of the case.

He felt that the Bench of Bishops had some right to be astonished and dissatisfied with the course pursued by the Government in respect to this Bill. The Bill was brought in on one night, when scarcely a single Peer was present, and was read a first time; and the second reading was fixed for the night following. Fortunately the interposition of a noble Lord, who moved the rejection of the Bill, rescued them from that difficulty. But why should not the whole Bench of Bishops have been allowed full opportunity of considering a matter so intimately connected with the interests of the Church? The Bill had only been presented on Friday last—and they had had no opportunity of consulting on a measure so novel, and so deeply affecting the interests of the Church. Never before, in the history of this country, had a measure been introduced by which Parliament proposed to deal in so summary a manner with the affairs of the Church.

But the objections to the measure were, to his mind, insuperable. It was in direct opposition to one of the most sacred principles of the Church. A Bishop had no right to resign, and up to that moment had never pretended to resign, except with the authority of him from whom he had received his mission to exercise his office; nor could any other accept his resignation except the ordinary who had given the mission. In the case of the Bishop, that ordinary was the Archbishop; and, in like manner, no clergyman could resign his cure of souls except into the hands of the Bishop, who was bound to consider all the circumstances of the resignation as was the Archbishop in the case of Bishops, before he gave his sanction to it. This was the rule equally of the canon and the common law, as he would show the House by reading the following extracts from Gibson's Codex—

"1. Resignation must be made to one who hath power to admit it—Renunciatio fieri debet in manus ejus qui habet potestatem eam admittendi—and that is, in general, to the person who granted admission to the benefice resigned; and, therefore, donatives are not resignable to the ordinary, but to the patron, who hath power to admit. But there is one exception as to the Queen. If it be true doctrine that deaneries of the Queen's gift may well be resigned to the Queen, which is much to be questioned, wherever there is a Bishop, the immediate superior; because, however, the Crown hath the right of nomination, yet legal possession is not to be obtained—nor by consequence to be resigned—but by canonical methods.

"2. Resignation can only be made to a superior. This is a maxim in the temporal law; and is applied by Coke to the ecclesiastical law, when he says that therefore a Bishop cannot resign to a Dean and Chapter, but it must be to the metropolitan, from whom he received confirmation and consecration."

He cannot, therefore, resign during the vacancy of the metropolitan see—when the Dean and Chapter are guardians of the temporalities—but must wait for the appointment of the new Archbishop.

"3. Resignation must be made in person, and not by proxy.

"4. No resignation can be valid until accepted by the proper ordinary. That is, no person appointed to a cure of souls can quit that cure, or discharge himself of it, but upon good motives, to be approved by the superior who admitted it to him—for it may be that he would quit it for money, or to live idly, or the like. And this is the law, as well of the State, as of the Church."

The instance of Archbishop Grindal had been referred to, as a precedent for these political resignations. But that instance, properly considered, was conclusive on the other side; it showed, that an Archbishop could not resign to the Crown; for the Crown, although his immediate superior in all causes spiritual, was not at all concerned with the exercise of his authority in pure spiritualities. Queen Elizabeth required Archbishop Grindal to resign; he himself was eagerly desirous of resigning; but it was found, that neither the requisition of the Queen, nor the wish of the Archbishop—nor both together—were sufficient to effect their purpose. Whitgift, the designated successor, who was much better versed in the constitutional law of the Church, than either the Queen or Grindal, absolutely refused to accept the metropolitan see during Grindal's life, and his objection prevailed. Grindal died Archbishop of Canterbury. But the present measure sets at nought all these considerations, and is utterly inconsistent with the constitution of the Church.

This matter of resignations was one of the most embarrassing things in administering the affairs of the Church, for there was too much reason to suppose that they were often founded on corrupt bargains, and he had, for himself, always exercised the greatest caution in accepting resignations; but this Bill, he feared, would be a declaration of the right of all ecclesiastics to make similar bargains. He was quite sure that the right rev. Prelate (the Bishop of London) had never seen this Bill—if he had, he would never have consented to it—he would have seen at once that it showed a determination to set at nought all the rules and principles of the ecclesiastical law, and to stretch to the utmost the interference of the State in the affairs of the Church. For what reason could be given for permitting Bishops to make bargains for resignation, which would not be equally applicable to Rectors, Vicars, Incumbents of every kind? To such a principle he (the Bishop of Exeter) had the very strongest objection, and would resist it to the uttermost. If a Rector had entered into any such bargain he would have rendered himself liable to ecclesiastical proceedings. No doubt it was desirable to provide for such cases as those of the two right rev. Prelates to whom this measure referred; but then the Legislature should proceed with a due regard to Church principles.

Then, as to the haste with which the present measure had been introduced—the wish of the two Bishops had not been known more than three weeks, and the Government had taken only a fortnight to decide on and draw up the present measure. But, what was the necessity for pressing on the measure with such haste? There was no necessity for passing it before the close of the present Session, because the season during which the Bishops had active duties—such as confirmations—was the earlier part of the year; in the latter part of the year, the duties of Bishops ordinarily consisted of such matters or ministrations, as could be performed by Commission. And, then, if the matter were deferred to next Session, the Government would have time to consider the best course to adopt—not merely to provide for the present circumstances of the sees of London and Durham, but the circumstances of the Church generally in this matter—by devising some measure which should not be open to the objections of the present Bill, but such as might meet the exigencies of the case, without violating the recognised principles of the Church. He would not now recommend any particular course; but he would remind their Lordships that the Church itself was not without some provision for cases of this kind. From the earliest ages coadjutor Bishops had been appointed, who, taking their title from some town in the diocese, and with or without the right of succession, administered the affairs of the diocese, by virtue of a Commission from the Bishop—but the great principle of the canon law was, that the Bishop of the diocese retained, during life, full possession of his dignity and office. He, therefore, earnestly besought their Lordships, for the sake of the Bishop of London himself—not to assent to this measure. He (the Bishop of Exeter) was sure that it would embitter the last days of that venerable and admirable man—whose life had been spent, as it would be vain to expect from any probable successor—to find that the principles of the Church had been set aside, in order that he might receive this pension on his retirement.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY said, that he thought the apprehensions of the right rev. Prelate were very much exaggerated. At least, there would be no difficulty in modifying the Bill so as to provide that the resignation of his see by a Bishop should be into the hands of his Metropolitan. Until the Act of Elizabeth made it unlawful, it was perfectly lawful for a Bishop to resign his see and retire upon one-third of its emoluments; and in the present Bill Government were only going back to that time, and, in two specific cases applying that rule which had been until then general. The dioceses immediately under the consideration of the House were of so great importance that they ought not for a moment to be left without episcopal superintendence, and when the right rev. Prelates who now presided over them came forward spontaneously and declared their inability to perform the duties of their office, he thought no time ought to be lost in providing their successors. If a Commander in Chief were to make a similar statement, and tender his resignation, would there be a moment's hesitation as to what ought to be done? Would they not say that although they were opposed to the principle of resignation in the army generally, yet that here was a particular case in which it was for the good of the country it should be allowed. If that were the case as regarded secular matters, how much more so ought it to hold in ecclesiastical affairs? In conclusion, he hoped their Lordships would not be led away by the terror of the Church being endangered, but would consent to read the Bill a second time, as it could, in Committee, be amended to meet the views of the right rev. Prelate.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, he had no hesitation with regard to the vote which he was about to give in favour of the Amendment that the Bill be read a second time that day three months; but he should give it with some regret, because of the possible inconvenience that might arise from the postponement of legislation, owing to the incapacity of these right rev. Prelates who presided over these important sees; because he was not unfavourable to the general principle of retiring provision, whether of Bishops or the inferior clergy; and because the discussion must be painful to the feelings of two right rev. Prelates eminently distinguished for their abilities and private virtues. The objection upon which he rested his vote was not that of the right rev. Prelate (the Bishop of Exeter), that the arrangement was in opposition to the doctrine of the Church, although he felt the weight of the right rev. Prelate's arguments, and was bound to say the Bill was framed in entire disregard of all Church principles and Church discipline. His objection was, that they were dealing exceptionally and with individual cases, where they should deal generally and upon broad principles. As yet he had not heard any sufficient reason to satisfy him of the propriety of the course pursued by Her Majesty's Government, and if he wanted proof of the extreme inconvenience of that course it was furnished by the speeches in defence of the Bill, which turned the whole of this important discussion into the consideration of the personal and individual merits of these two Prelates, the sacrifices which would be made by them, and the reasonableness of the terms of the bargain proposed by the Government. That a great question involving important points of Church discipline should be so dealt with afforded one of the strongest objections to this mode of legislation. But his noble Friend who had just sat down justified the dealing separately with these two cases upon the grounds of emergency and special circumstances.

The Earl of Harrowby

With regard to emergency, although he did not know when the offer was made by the two right rev. Prelates, he believed the health of the Bishop of Durham and the health of the Bishop of London had for some weeks, if not for some months, been very much the same. He was reminded that six months ago the Bishop of Durham, so far from discharging the duties, handed over everything to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY said, he received a communication from the Bishop of Durham in November last, stating that he was anxious to resign his see.

THE EARL OF DERBY: Then, as far as the Bishop of Durham was concerned, no case of emergency could be raised; for, if communication of his readiness to resign was made to the Government in November, they had full leisure to consider whether they would introduce any Bill, or a special Bill, or a general Bill. But, if he were not mistaken, the subject of a general Bill had been under the consideration of Her Majesty's Government. This question had not taken them by surprise—they had been looking for it; they had had a proposition upon the subject of a general Bill early in the Session, but they preferred to wait for an emergency, which in one case, at all events, was not unforeseen. But it was said there were special circumstances, and they could not deal with these right rev. Prelates as they could with any others who might succeed them. Why not? He admitted that they could not compel a person to resign on any terms they fixed; but he did not see why they should not deal with the case of the Bishops of London and Durham as they would with the holders of other offices, and he must say the illustration of the noble Earl (the Earl of Harrowby) upon that point was rather remarkable. The noble Earl asked whether it would be decent, in case a Commander in Chief became incapable to perform the duties of his office, to bargain very closely as to the sum of money for his resignation. Unfortunately, by a dispensation of Providence, within a very short time the case had occurred. The Commander in Chief found himself incapable of performing the duties of his office; but he did not go to Her Majesty and bargain what amount he should receive for resigning it—he at once resigned his office, and did not ask for any allowance for doing so. There had been a long discussion as to the reasonable amount of the retiring allowances, but he passed over whether it was a reasonable bargain. His objection was to any bargain. The law of England had for centuries prohibited anything in the way of traffic and bargain for the resignation of any office in the Church, and if it were not so there would be no necessity for this Bill. They were introducing an exceptional case for the purpose of violating the law, and all the arguments which were used against the system of special legislation in divorce cases applied precisely the same to this case, where, for the benefit of two Prelates, they were giving a licence to them to violate the fundamental law of the land. It was denied that there was any corruption in the matter. No one imputed corruption in a sense to make it dishonourable, but only as it was corrupt to require consideration of any kind for abandoning a spiritual office. He had no doubt there were many cases in which it would be generally advantageous for an aged clergyman to retire, on receipt, by arrangement with his successor, of a portion of the income; but the law said that was simony, and the Bishop would not listen to such a suggestion. The same might be said in the case of these Bishops as in the case of any private patron. The word "traffic" had been objected to. He believed his noble Friend the Chairman of the Committee did not use the word "traffic," but the word "negotiation." The noble Earl (the Earl of Chichester) said there was no negotiation. There was no protracted negotiation, because the first terms that were offered were accepted; but, in the sense of conditions laid down on the one side, and accepted on the other, for the purpose of doing a certain act, negotiations were entered into by the Bishops and assented to by the Government, and that description of negotiation and traffic was strictly prohibited by the law of England. It was said that it might be very desirable to have a general measure; but that this was a peculiar case in which no additional charge would be thrown upon the public funds. It appeared to him that if that argument were admitted it would interpose a most important difficulty in the way of that general measure which all desired to see adopted. If it was to be said that it was only in cases where there was to be a prospective reduction of income, and where there would be consequently a surplus from which to provide retiring pensions, that introduced an insuperable obstacle to the adoption of a general measure. He thought, therefore, that this mode of dealing exceptionally with individual cases in violation of the law was objectionable in principle, and that any violation of the law of England was a much more serious matter than any possible inconvenience which might result from delaying for a few months a measure that would perhaps eventually be attended with some advantage. For those reasons, although favourable to the principle of retirement upon fixed rules, and although he entertained the highest respect and veneration for the two right rev. Prelates whose cases were immediately connected with the measure, he could not consent to the adoption of the Bill, which was nothing less than a violation of the great fundamental principle of the law of the land.

LORD LYNDEHURST said, that he rose simply to answer a question which had been put to him by the right rev. Prelate (the Bishop of Exeter). The right rev. Prelate said that resignation must be made to a superior, and that, as there was no superior to an Archbishop, an Archbishop could not resign. He (Lord Lyndhurst) had ventured to oppose that doctrine, and had said the resignation in the case put must be to the Crown. He had turned to the authority of Blackstone, and he found that that commentator stated that "resignation must be made to some superior. Therefore a Bishop must resign to the Metropolitan; but the Archbishop can resign to none but the King himself."

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY said, he was equally sorry and surprised to find the Bill before their Lordships opposed by many noble Lords who were known to be friendly to the Church and to the interests of religion; yet he was at a loss to know what could be less consistent with those interests than that two such dioceses as London and Durham should be left for an indefinite period without efficient episcopal control and superintendence. Those dioceses comprised a seventh part of the population of England, and the population of one of them, at least, would be allowed to be of a most important character; and the Bill now proposed was intended to remedy an inconvenience which, whatever attempts had been made to extenuate the evil, were greatly to be deprecated—for the most important and most anxious duties of a Bishop were those which could not be delegated to any one else—and to remove a reproach which would otherwise lie heavily on the Church. Those of their Lordships who knew the character, the sensitive character, of the Bishop of London, would agree with him that nothing would be more certain to aggravate the pressure of disease, to embitter, if not shorten, what might remain to him of life, than the consciousness that he was accountable for duties without the power of performing them—duties of which he knew and had proved the importance and the value. It was from that responsibility that he sought to be relieved; and it would be a bad return for a life spent, if ever life was so spent, in the service of the public—he said the public, for their Lordships knew that his services were no less valuable in that House than in the Church—it would be an ungrateful return for a life so spent if he were now denied that retirement which his health required, and which he had so painfully earned. The resignation of a Bishop, for good and sufficient causes, was an acknowledged part of the constitution of the Church, although it might be that no case of such retirement had occurred since the Reformation. In regard to our own country, Lord Coke laid it down as a rule, which was confirmed by Gibson, Burnes, and Blackstone, that a provincial Bishop resigns to his Metropolitan. It was, indeed, a mistake—he said it with all deference—to omit the mention of this legitimate method of resignation in the Bill; but the noble and learned Lord had promised to correct that defect in the Committee. Accordingly such resignation was provided for on the creation of Bishops for the Colonies, and there were now in this country two ex-Bishops—Bishops without sees, having resigned them into the hands of their Metropolitan the Bishop of Calcutta. He (the Archbishop of Canterbury) had recently accepted from the Bishops of New Zealand and of Toronto the resignation of a portion of their dioceses, intended to be assigned to other sees. It had been thought, as he understood, that the object of this Bill should rather have been attained by a general measure, regulating the conditions on which Bishops should resign their sees, than by a special Act for a single purpose; and, undoubtedly, a general measure of the kind was highly desirable, defining the condition on which a superannuated Bishop might resign his charge. But all would at once perceive that no future Bishop could ever be in the situation of the two Prelates who were the subjects of this

The Archbishop of Canterbury

Bill. No future Prelate could ever have a life interest in an income like that which those Bishops were ready to resign. The amount of retiring salary had been objected to by the noble Lord who moved the rejection of the Bill. If the Bishop of London had thought himself at liberty to use his episcopal income for the purpose of making to himself a fortune or of aggrandizing his family, he might easily have become independent of any retiring salary. He (the Archbishop of Canterbury) might say, without exaggeration, that if that Bishop had spared from his public and private charities the half of what he has, in fact, employed in supplying the spiritual destitution of his vast diocese, he might have provided against the present emergency. He hoped their Lordships would forgive the right rev. Prelate if he had been more careful to provide for his diocese than for himself or those who may surround him. He had thus briefly stated the reasons why he should give his cordial concurrence to the Bill, which he trusted would receive their Lordships' sanction.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE said, he should have contented himself with a silent vote upon this occasion; but for some remarks that had fallen from the most rev. Prelate who had just sat down. He would, in the first place remark, that throughout the discussion there had been a general admission of the principle of resignation, and it was therefore unnecessary for him to say one word in its favour. The most rev. Prelate had said that the present cases could never again occur, as the two particular Bishops were in a position in regard to income in which none of their successors would ever be placed. The fair inference from that argument was, that if this Bill were adopted, there could never be any other similar measure upon the same principle upon which this would have been passed. He feared it was too late to hope to pass a general measure this year; but, great as were the evils of continuing the present arrangements in these two dioceses, he would rather do that than expose every other bishopric in the kingdom to the risk of remaining without such a remedy as it was now sought to apply exceptionally. Sorry as he was to say anything which might hurt the feelings of any person, in this matter it was necessary to lay aside delicacy—and it must be notorious to the greater part of their Lordships that Durham and London were not the only two dioceses in which a similar remedy was necessary. Why bring in a Bill to relieve the Bishops of London and Durham from their functions, and yet not deal with two other Prelates who were at this moment in precisely the same position? He should, perhaps, be told, "because they have not resigned." But why had they not resigned? They waited of course for a general measure on this subject, knowing perfectly well that a Bill would not be brought in specifically to meet their case, because the House of Commons would not grant pensions out of the Ecclesiastical Funds. The Government, however, were no doubt in hopes that the House of Commons would pass this Bill, because, though the proposed pensions were to be taken nominally and ostensibly from the Ecclesiastical Funds, those funds would not in reality be diminished, because by the arrangement which would be made a larger sum would be paid in than would be taken out. The question, then, was reduced entirely to one of pounds, shillings, and pence, and he looked upon the present proposal as one degrading to the Church, injurious to the Bishops, as well as to the various dioceses, and one which would present insuperable obstacles in the way of future legislation. The Archbishop of York and the Bishop of Norwich were, it was well known, in the same position as the two Prelates, who would be affected by this Bill. Whatever might be the fate of this measure hereafter, let it not be said that those who opposed it were responsible for the position of the two dioceses he had just mentioned. On the contrary, the responsibility would rest with those who brought forward such a Bill instead of adopting some scheme of legislation by which the case of all would be equally covered. He would not argue the point as to whether the proposed pensions were too much or too little. The question involved was, he thought, a very much larger one. He looked upon it as essential to the interests of the Church that power should be given for Bishops to resign when no longer qualified to discharge the duties of their office, and he believed their Lordships would be throwing great obstacles in the way of such a provision if they passed this measure into law. Although he should give his vote with great reluctance in as far as it would affect these two dioceses; yet, looking at the whole question from a larger point of view, he hoped their Lordships would refuse their sanction to the second reading.

LORD DENMAN thought it would be much fairer to the Bishop of London, and more grateful to the feelings of that right rev. Prelate, to reject this Bill at once. The discussion of this question in the House of Commons could not be otherwise than painful to that right rev. Prelate, who, he (Lord Denman) believed, would find himself able to resume his duties. On broad grounds, he was of opinion that the country would receive a general measure with much greater satisfaction than an exceptional one.

THE BISHOP OF OXFORD said, the ground upon which his vote would be given against the passing of this Bill was as nearly as possible what had been so well stated by the noble Duke who had just sat down and by the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Derby). It was not because he underrated the evil which it was now sought to remedy; but he felt deeply that some measure was needed to meet the general evil which now existed in the Church arising out of the impossibility—for a moral impossibility it was—for those who held the episcopal office to lay that office down if they felt themselves unable to discharge their duties. There were different ways in which this evil might have been met. It might have been met by adopting the ancient practice of appointing coadjutor Bishops, or by proposing a general Bill which would enable Bishops to resign. Let their Lordships observe the greatness of the evil, in one point, which had not been noticed in the discussion. The amount of work in any office was naturally fixed, to a great degree, as regarded him who succeeded to that office, by the amount of work performed by him who retired; and as the present system prevented Bishops from resigning when no longer qualified properly to discharge their episcopal functions, the consequence was that the whole scale of episcopal duties was lowered by the continuance of this evil. Now, this being the case, their Lordships were asked to apply a doubtful palliative to those cases which, if you did not apply this palliative, might lead to the remedy of the whole system. The universal course of legislation in both House of Parliament showed that it was only when a particular evil arose which was too great to be borne that a general measure was passed, dealing with the general interests involved; and there were no such certain means of prolonging a bad system as by palliating those particular instances which would justify the Government in dealing with the evil as a whole. With regard to his right rev. Friend the Bishop of London, that Prelate, during the time he had presided over his present see, had displayed a singleness of heart, an ability, a conscientiousness, and a power such as had been rarely exhibited on the Episcopal Bench; and it was when you found such a man, by God's visitation, rendered unable to discharge his duties, and willing to make provision for the discharge of those duties by another, that there arose one of those fortunate opportunities which would induce a conscientious Government to say, "Now is the time for breaking through the difficulties which will always beset such a question, and for passing a general measure to meet the evils now complained of." Could their Lordships doubt that, if this Bill were thrown out to-night, a general measure would be brought forward next Session? On the other hand, did their Lordships believe that if they passed this Bill such a measure would be introduced? Leave this particular evil unredressed for a few months, and what was it—great as it might be—compared with the general evil of placing the Bishops in such a position as to be unable to find assistance or to resign when age or infirmity told upon them? Let their Lordships pass this measure, however, and they would put off indefinitely the cure of this evil. For his own part the only object which he had in view was the redress of a great public evil, and he might inform their Lordships that at the commencement of the present Session. Her Majesty's Government had been placed in possession of a general scheme which would have applied to the general evil, and which would have included the two cases for which it was now proposed to legislate. That a general scheme was necessary there could be no doubt. He had himself received a letter from a right rev. Brother saying that he would gladly follow the example of the Bishops of London and Durham, if any provision, however slender, could be made for him. He asked their Lordships, therefore, as there was a great evil to be remedied, and inasmuch as the remedy for that evil was not withheld by those who opposed the present Bill, but by those who had neglected to bring in a general measure, to pause before agreeing to a course which would render it next to impossible to introduce a general scheme at any future period. As long back as last

The Bishop of Oxford

November the Archbishop of Canterbury had pointed out to the Government the necessity of a general measure; but, notwithstanding the representation, it was only at the close of the Session that Her Majesty's Government introduced a particular Bill, and one of which the great majority of their Lordships had not considered the bearings. He begged their Lordships, therefore, to take time, and to hear the case fully discussed before they formed their judgment, and not to adopt a plan which in his conscience he believed would prevent a satisfactory solution of the difficulty which existed, but to wait until the case was fully before them, and then conscientiously, deliberately, and decidedly to adopt means to remedy a great wrong.

On question, that "now" stand part of the Motion, their Lordships divided:—Content 47; Not Content 35: Majority 12.

PROTEST.

Against Second Reading of The Bishops of London and Durham Retirement Bill.

DISSENTIENT—"1. Because it is a most objectionable course of legislation to make laws which shall affect only particular cases, unless those cases are of so special a nature that but few similar instances can be expected. But the inability of Bishops to discharge the duties of their high office by reason of old age or permanent infirmity of mind or body is notoriously a matter of very frequent occurrence, and ought therefore to be provided for, not by private Acts affecting only certain individuals, but by some general law applying to all similar cases.

"2. Because in the Bill now before the House, one of the most ancient and essential principles of the constitution of the Church is openly violated by declaring by Act of Parliament that the Sees of London and Durham 'shall become vacant,' without any reference whatsoever to the obligations of the Bishops of those Sees not to resign the high office in the Church of Christ to which they have received mission from their several Metropolitans, except into the hands, and with the express acceptance, of the said Metropolitans after duly considering the reasons for such resignation.

"3. Because the Bill proceeds on a recital which implies, on the part of those Bishops, forgetfulness of the Church's law in respect to resignations made on any compact for money, or emolument, or advantage of any kind. The statement of this reason must not be construed into the expression of belief of the entire accuracy of that recital; on the contrary, justice to those venerable Prelates requires us to believe rather, that the persons who drew the Bill failed to state correctly the precise terms in which the said Bishops represented to Her Majesty their wish to retire.

"4. Because an Act of Parliament professing to be founded on a transaction, which, if it were proved against any spiritual person, might probably be deemed corrupt, and be visited accordingly with severe ecclesiastical censure, could hardly fail to operate as a most pernicious stimulus to uncanonical and corrupt resignations by holders of benefices generally. That the practice of tampering with conscience in respect to such resignations, especially in connection with the law which permits the sale, not only of advowsons, but also of next presentations, prevails already to a fearful extent, there is too much reason to apprehend. The worst consequences therefore must ensue, if the Legislature itself, in the cases of any Prelates,—especially of any of those, whose high qualities and long-experienced services to the Church, would give more than common authority to their supposed example—shall appear to sanction such example by giving to it the force of law.

"H. EXETER."

COAST-GUARD SERVICE BILL.

Order for Second reading read.

SIR CHARLES WOOD: At a late hour last night, Sir, I stated that I was anxious at the earliest opportunity to explain to the House the general tenor of the measure which Her Majesty's Government thought it necessary to propose for the purpose of providing a more adequate reserve force for the naval service and protection of the coasts of the country. The Bill, the second reading of which I now beg to move, contains a small portion only of that plan which Her Majesty's Government proposes ultimately to adopt. But I shall take the opportunity on this occasion to state the full plan which the Government contemplates, in order that the House and the country may be aware of the whole state of the case, and of the extent of the plan which may at some future time entail a heavy expense on the country. I am anxious, therefore, that the House should know the full extent of our views, in the hope that it will concur with the Government, and support a measure which I believe to be essentially necessary for the safety of the country. I think it of the utmost importance to the country that it should possess an efficient coast-guard service, as that might be, by being immediately available on the breaking out of hostilities of the utmost utility to the nation at some future period. We have learnt much by the late war. I hope in regard to the navy that we had less to learn than in respect to the army, because the navy, even in time of peace, has always been kept in an efficient state. It has always been found necessary to keep up a naval force for the protection of our commerce and of our colonies in all parts of the world, so that even in time of peace the navy was not left in that state of repose in which the army was necessarily placed. But although we have not had quite so much to learn in regard to the navy as to the army, still there has been much to be learnt by those who have taken an active part in the administration of our naval force. Although we have known for long the necessity of further measures in regard to the manning of the navy, yet there is no inconsiderable portion of the country quite unaware of the absolute necessity of taking measures for providing a large reserve of seamen to supply our naval force. I believe for the last thirty years hardly any person has taken a part in the management of the naval force of the country without feeling the great difficulty of providing, with sufficient rapidity on any emergency, any considerable addition to the number of men employed in our fleets. There is no difficulty in supplying ample materials for the navy. Ships of any size or number, guns of any calibre or number, adapted to the requirements of modern times, are readily to be obtained. But, since we have ceased manning our navy by means of impressment, difficulties have occasionally arisen in supplying the requisite number of men. In former times, this was speedily and effectually done by means of impressment; but of late years, the great object, and a most desirable object it is, has been to avoid the necessity of having recourse to so harsh a measure. The subject from time to time occupied the attention of different Governments, and the question has been raised how and by what means it is possible to provide a substitute for that forcible mode of raising seamen. Although it may be necessary to have recourse to that compulsory method in the case of an emergency, yet the House would never consent to call it into practice so long as there remained other means of supplying a sufficiency of men to the naval service. Nor do I think that the House of Commons would be willing to withhold any grant of money that was necessary to prevent the Government having recourse to a practice so harsh and so opposed to the feelings of Englishmen. There is not much difficulty in gradually increasing the number of men in the navy. During eight months in the years 1853 and 1854 the number of seamen were increased by 12,000 without resorting to means of compulsion. The service has, no doubt, during a succession of years been improved in almost every circumstance that could contribute to the well-being of the sailor. The pay has been higher, the food has been better, the discipline has been more efficient, and the navy may truly congratulate itself on being the most deserving and the most popular part of Her Majesty's service. The increase of numbers before the war was continuous and steady, since the war it has been more rapid. In December, 1853, the number of seamen borne on the books was only 28,000; in January, 1854, it was 29,000; in February, 33,000; in March, 34,800; in April, 36,000; in May, 37,000; in June, 39,000; in July, 39,700; and in August, 40,600, making an increase in eight months of 12,600. In November, 1855, the number was 44,700, being an increase in two years of 16,700 men. Speaking generally, the men are of the most excellent description. Of course they are not all able seamen, but many of those who have not previously served in the navy are seafaring men and possess the habits of sailors. Many, of course, were inexperienced, as must be expected; but they, nevertheless, when mixed with a certain portion of old sailors, formed a very efficient part of the crew, and I believe that after the young men had been a few weeks at sea they were found better seamen than on any former occasion at the commencement of a war. At the same time we must not shut our eyes to the fact that during the late war we never had a naval engagement. No engagement took place with the Russian ships; the enemy never came out of harbour. I hope and trust that a long series of years may elapse before we shall again be engaged in hostilities; but we should be very shortsighted indeed if we shut our eyes against the possibility that such an event might occur; and we should be equally shortsighted if, on the occurrence of such an event, we were not amply provided for and prepared to meet it. I the other day read an exceedingly interesting paper in reference to the naval force of France. It was the opinion of that distinguished officer Admiral La Susse. In point of the number of seamen, France is not deficient, and in point of gallantry nothing can surpass them. Happily a strict alliance and the best feeling prevail between the two countries. That alliance has been cemented by both countries being engaged in a common cause, and by the blood of both nations having been freely shed in the same battle. The material interests of both countries are promoted and the cause of humanity advanced by that alliance, and I trust never to see the day when that alliance shall be severed. But because that is the state of things between the two nations, and because there can exist no jealousy or ill-will between them, it is that we can speak freely upon the subject of our national defences, and contrast it with the naval means possessed by our friend and ally, taking his position as a lesson from which we may derive much instruction. Under their present state of organisation the French can, at any time, produce a much larger number of seamen than this country is able to do. The French, besides what they have afloat, have on shore a considerable number of seamen, which would always enable them, at any given moment, to put a larger force on shipboard than this country could. It is notorious that the other great maritime Power, Russia, also maintains a much larger number of seamen than this country does. During the late war a large proportion of those seamen were withdrawn to defend their forts on shore, and it was well known that the greater part of the artillerymen at Sebastopol were taken from the Baltic fleet. I think I need hardly say that that is not the condition in which this great country should stand. The increase made to our fleet has been most satisfactory as to numbers, but I must confess that the period of time in which this was accomplished, and could be accomplished on any future occasion, is not quite so satisfactory. When any sudden demand arises for an additional number of sailors the men must necessarily be drawn from the mercantile service. To supply the vacancy thus created, the merchants must take other men and apprentices—persons who have not been previously employed in the discharge of naval duties. To a certain limited extent this demand may be met, but if it goes beyond a certain amount, what is the further result? The moment the demand for the mercantile service becomes heavy by reason of their men being withdrawn for the Queen's service, the merchants immediately offer a larger bounty than the Government, and the consequence is, that the efficient hands enter the merchant service in preference to the Queen's service. Suppose the Admiralty offered a bounty of £10, or even a higher sum, to all men entering the navy, the merchant with whom they were competing would know that if he could not get his crew completed, he might have to pay £300 or £400 for demurrage; and he could easily, therefore, afford to give a much larger bounty to secure the five or six hands he might want than any amount of bounty which could be held out generally by the country to men for the navy. Besides, in the end the merchant would lose nothing by it, because he would charge the additional cost of freight upon the articles he imported, and the bounty he offered would thus be paid by the community at large. Entry, therefore, from the merchant service cannot be made at once of any great number of men. The other mode is that Government should itself train men for the navy. They have been trying for many years, and with great success, the experiment of entering a large number of boys; but I need not say that that is a very slow process, and which could not be of the slightest use in the case which I am supposing, namely, a sudden emergency in which it was necessary to send a great many ships to sea without delay. The position of this country, then, is a much more difficult one than that of any other nation—I am not, of course, referring to America, where the difficulty is as great or greater than our own—but I am speaking of the European Powers, by whom, in some shape or another, the system of compulsory service is still retained. In former times we could raise 25,000 men in a single year with the help of impressment, but that is an expedient to which the Government can never again have recourse, except in extreme necessity. The only permanent reserve which we have at present for manning our ships, are the marines. The force of marines at the commencement of the late war numbered 12,000; it was raised during the war, and it is now 16,000 strong. With regard to the importance of maintaining them at that strength, I entirely concur with the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir J. Graham). They are a most useful force. They are equal to the best soldiers on shore, and are only inferior to able seamen afloat; and I quite agree with the right hon. Baronet, that they will form a very solid foundation for any sudden increase of the naval forces of the country. I propose, therefore, not to reduce the number of marines; but they do not properly come within the scope of my present observations, which have reference solely to seamen. With regard to the seamen of France, and their means of manning their navy, I wish to read two or three extracts from Reports in which the opinions expressed by very distinguished men are given. Three or four years ago a Commission of inquiry was instituted on the subject, when some most distinguished French officers were examined. I call attention to the opinions expressed by those officers, because I wish the House to see that other people are aware of those evils to which we shut our eyes. Admiral La Susse says—

Sir Charles Wood

“ It is generally thought in France that because we have fewer sailors and ships than England, France could not with advantage make war with her. I affirm this to be a great error. The number of men registered between twenty and forty years of age is at the present day as high as 50,000, adding the men that the recrutement and marines could furnish, France, in the event of a naval war, could count on 90,000 men, a number sufficient to man all the ships in the fleet. Some very false ideas are current in France on the subject of a naval war. The number of ships on either side is counted, and then without consideration the conclusion is arrived at that success will be on the side possessing the greatest number of ships. This is a false conclusion. . . . I have the most perfect conviction that France has nothing to fear in a war with England, and comparing our ships under the Empire with those of the present day, I am confident in such a struggle, if well directed, that England would suffer much more than France.”

Vice-Admiral Dupetit Thouars speaks in the same way. He says—

“ The composition of our equipages des lignes is admirable, our organisation of the personnel very good. This is a real power which we possess; what we want is the matériel.”

It is quite true also that at the present moment the French are making the most successful efforts to increase their navy. They are building ships as fast as we are. They have far better means, as I have previously stated, of putting men rapidly on board their ships than we have. Their system is as follows:—They have a book of inscription in which the names of all seafaring men are entered. They are called out for service in the navy. From 20,000 to 25,000 men at a time serve for about three years; and they are taught all that a seaman has to learn. The actual time they are kept in the navy differs, but when they are discharged, they are still liable at any time to be called upon to serve, and be put on board ship again. They are therefore men who have gone through all the naval tactics, and who have learnt all that is to be taught in the navy, so that when they come back to the service they are perfectly well trained men. In the same Report from which I have already quoted, it is observed—

Sir Charles Wood

“ At the present time, by means of the levée permanente, all the seamen furnished by the inscription maritime have in succession passed through the navy, and have all received a complete education, both in seamanship and gunnery.”

Another body of men is raised by conscription—7,000 in number, who are trained for the navy, but they seldom make good seamen. It is not natural to them, but they have all the fighting qualities. They understand the management of the great guns, and are thus of the greatest possible use. That is the state of the French navy, and the result is summed up by M. Lanjuinais in these words—

“ On the whole, we believe that, making allowance for all contingencies, we may count on 40,000 seamen eminently fit for war, and on 20,000 borrowed, partly from the inscription and partly from the recrutement, and capable of rendering efficient service if they are properly embodied with the former. It must not be said that we are to count as nothing the novices who have little experience, the master mariners, and the seamen above the proper age, not comprised in the 60,000, who are certainly available; but these must be reserved for service on shore, in transports, and in the defence of the coasts.”

Now, I ask the House to consider for a moment what is the ordinary state of things in this country. We of course maintain a large number of men afloat, but our seamen are generally scattered over a vast portion of the world. We have extensive colonies and an extensive commerce. Our sailors are employed for the protection of those colonies and of that commerce; but whatever our naval service has been in former years we still want, beyond the ships scattered all over the whole world, a certain force at home, and, above all, we want that which the French and the Russians have, the means of putting at once on board ship a considerable number of seamen. I do not expect the measure which I now propose to accomplish that which, in the opinion of the Government, ought ultimately to be done; but it will considerably aid in providing seamen for our naval service. Measures have from time to time been taken to strengthen the reserve naval force of this country, but I think it better that the measures should be combined together. A certain number of men are entered in the dockyards as riggers, and who are liable to be called into active service in case of war. We drew somewhere about 200 men from this source. The great reserve, however, has been that body of men called the coast-guard. For many years past men who have entered the coast-guard have previously been sailors. The whole number of that body is about 5,000. About 2,000 of those men were draughted last year to serve in the Baltic fleet. There is another body small in number—the pensioners, but who are not very efficient for active service. The whole number of men who were and who might be called into service on an emergency I should state to be about 3,000, and that in all probability not more than about 2,500 were at any one time so employed. Comparing this number with the extent of our maritime power, I must say that such a state of things does not consist with the honour, the interests, or the safety of the country. The circumstance that we were actually able to withdraw 2,000 men from the coast-guard pointed out that branch of the service as the first to which we could look to in forming a reserve. I propose, therefore, to enlarge its numbers, and to render it more perfectly naval in its character. Some years ago there was a force called the Naval Blockade. It consisted of two ships—one in the Downs and the other at Nowhaven—on board each of which 1,200 were stationed. Those men were all sailors, either moved from other ships or raised by the officers from the general service; and they were employed in the protection of the revenue. It was supposed that that plan was more expensive than it might have been; although I believe there was some misconception on the subject. It was put an end to in the year 1830. There was a good opportunity, of judging of the efficiency of the system as far as manning the navy on an emergency. It being necessary to send ships suddenly to Lisbon, the commanding officer got into his boat, and ran down the coast to give notice to his men. They immediately mustered on board their ship, and they were ready to sail the next day. I propose to render the coast-guard as available as the coast blockade were. The coast-guard originally consisted in great part of civilians, but in recent years a change had been introduced which has rendered it more of a naval body than it had been before. Most of the officers are now naval officers, and about two-thirds of the men were sailors, who have served a certain number of years afloat, and who have been admitted into the coast-guard on account of their good conduct. Those sailors are all liable to be recalled into the service; but there is this objection to the arrangement, that they remain in the service rather longer than was desirable. It was that circumstance which had furnished a foundation for the facetious account given by the hon. and gallant Admiral (Sir C. Napier) of the appearance of the coast-guard men in a ship's crew seated on the deck for Divine worship, who, when the chaplain began to read, all pulled off their caps displaying bald heads, and put on their spectacles. Those old gentlemen, however, if not fit to go aloft, were amongst the steadiest portion of the crew; and I have heard from some of the captains expressions of regret at losing their service. The proposal which I intend to make, in fact, is to increase the number of the coast-guard; to discharge all those who have been long in the service at an early period, so as to retain in the body a larger number of young men available for the general service of the country. I propose that their number should ultimately be 10,000, but I do not expect to obtain that number immediately. The increase must be gradual. There are a great number of men in the coast-guard who have not been sailors. With regard to them, I propose to leave all the existing regulations in force. These persons will be subject to the present regulations only; but with regard to those who have come from ships of war, and who, to all intents and purposes, are sailors, they will be subject to the same discipline and to the same liability of service as they were while on board; but they will have an allowance for provisions and lodging, when employed on shore, which will be equal to the present pay enjoyed by the commissioned boatmen and the boatmen of the coast-guard. Thus the persons forming the coast-guard will in future be tried seamen. I calculate that this will create a corps of reserve from which may be drawn, in case of emergency, from 5,000 to 7,000 of the best men, of good character, and who have been discharged from the service and appointed to the coast service as a reward for their good conduct. I must say that, even independently of naval considerations, there are good grounds for increasing the coast-guard for revenue purposes. The present number is not adequate. There are many cases where men are obliged to work night and day. Besides, there are several parts of the coast which have been most unaccountably left unprotected. The coast-guard in Ireland is also, as they are not expected to do duty at night, inefficient. I propose to make the body efficient throughout the United Kingdom. It is therefore indispensably necessary that the body should be considerably increased, and be put on a different footing. There are various parts of the country likewise in an undefended state. I propose to station ships at the principal ports of the country, which will be the head quarters of such a portion of the coast-guard service as is in the neighbourhood of those ports. There are also several revenue cruisers which I propose to attach to those ships as tenders. I have often been asked what I proposed to do with the new gunboats. I believe that they will form a most efficient class of vessels for this purpose. I propose to attach a certain number of them to the large ships, and they will be employed at times as revenue cruisers. The remainder can be used with their heavy guns for the training of the Naval Coast Volunteers; and it is in these vessels that the service of that body will be most efficient in future wars, for the defence of their own homes and shores. The Naval Coast Volunteers was set on foot six years ago, and was to have consisted of 10,000 men; but the whole number was never raised. But the whole attention of the Government having been turned to the raising of men for active service, the project for raising these volunteers has not met with much success, not by any means so much as it might have done, and, as I firmly believe, may still attend it. Further than improving the local organisation, I do not propose to make any alteration with regard to that body. The only complaint I have ever heard is one by the volunteers themselves—namely, that they have not been trained. The fact is, there has hitherto been no means of doing it; but I think it would be most desirable that they should be instructed from time to time in the guard-ship and the gunboats. I hope that by means of practising the batteries of the coast-guard the volunteers may receive a preliminary drill on Saturday evenings, and other times that will not interfere with their ordinary avocations; and then they may be mustered for a fortnight or three weeks in each year on board the practising vessels. I think also that the ships stationed at the different ports may be made most useful for the training of young men. Captain Harris, at Portsmouth, has had the greatest success in educating young men, and a great many novices and boys have been trained in his vessel. The people of this country have a natural affection and aptitude for the sea; and when the advantages of the Queen's service are known, I have no doubt they will be anxious to enter themselves. I may mention a curious instance of this. When a militia regiment was disbanded a short time since, a number of them volunteered, not for the marines, as might have been supposed, but for the navy. Our great object is to attract the people to the naval service, by making the advantages that it holds out more generally known. At present, all the knowledge that is possessed of that service is confined to persons living near the large naval ports. On a ship being stationed for the first time at a particular port, the people crowd on board, and are particularly struck with the cleanliness and comfort of the ship. Let this familiarity with naval matters be encouraged, and the people of this country will be more ready to engage in the maritime service. There is one other matter I wish to mention. All pensioners are liable to serve during the time they receive their pensions. My right hon. Friend (Sir J. Graham) introduced a measure to allow men, on their ships being paid off, to choose, after ten or fifteen years' service, to retire from the service, receiving a small pension, but still liable to be called upon to enter the Queen's service again in time of war; but a very inconsiderable number of persons have as yet had the opportunity of availing themselves of that proposal. The number will, however, gradually increase as ships are paid off, and they will form a great addition to the reserve for seamen. I am inclined to think that those persons who are thus paid off, those who belong to the coast-guard and pensioners, should be all brought together, and formed into one body of reserve. This subject of forming a reserve has for many years occupied the anxious attention of every person connected with the naval service, and I was delighted at hearing the other evening my right hon. Friend

(Sir J. Graham) express sentiments on this subject which entirely coincide with the opinions I myself entertain. With regard to the present measure, which is only to effect the transfer of the coast-guard from the Customs to the Admiralty, that is an arrangement which, perhaps, might have been effected without coming to Parliament, but I thought it better to submit the whole question to the House, in the hope that, knowing what it is the Government wish to do, Parliament would see the absolute necessity of taking adequate measures for providing a naval reserve. I hope I have succeeded in enabling the House to understand the views of the Government, and in convincing it that the plan I have proposed is the best and readiest mode of providing that which is admitted on all hands to be required for the interest and welfare of the country. I beg to move that the Bill be now read a second time.

SIR JAMES GRAHAM: Sir, hon. Members may, perhaps, remember that on a former occasion I stated that I was fully impressed with the necessity of such a measure as that which has now been proposed by my right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty, and that I endeavoured to point out to the House, when in office, the urgency of that necessity. My right hon. Friend has stated very truly, that the Coast Blockade was once connected with the Admiralty, and that there was found to be a great advantage in that connection. But in the year 1830, economy was the order of the day, and fiscal considerations, after a peace of long duration, and which at that time there was no prospect of seeing disturbed, prevailed before all other views, and it was thought expedient to transfer the coast-guard to the Board of Customs. But, notwithstanding that transfer, I and my colleagues endeavoured to give to that force a more naval character, by enabling meritorious seamen to be placed in that service as a reward for good conduct, but at the same time to be available in the naval service if war should unhappily return. That measure was found by experience to be perfectly correct. But my subsequent duties at the Admiralty, convinced me that the time had arrived when that decision of making the Coast Blockade merely a civil force, and subject to civil control ought to be reviewed. I agree with my right hon. Friend, that in outward appearance there will be a considerable increase of expense by the plan now proposed in the first instance; but I am decidedly of opinion that it will ultimately, in a fiscal point of view, be repaid to the public. At this moment a large portion of the coast is not watched by the coast-guard, and a large opening is left for smuggling; and there smuggling no doubt is, and will be carried on to a considerable extent. Now, the plan proposed will cover the whole of the coast of the United Kingdom. It will be well watched throughout, and I am quite satisfied that a salutary effect will ensue; and, if so, in the end the revenue will be more productive—the increased expense will be more apparent than real. It is also quite true, that although impressment, as the last melancholy resource of this country in an extreme emergency, must be retained, yet, as an ordinary means of increasing your naval power, no reliance can be placed on it. But what we want is, not to increase the number of men by force, but by attraction. We wish to induce men to enter the service. My right hon. Friend has pointed out the opposite course on the other side of the Channel, which has been in operation for nearly a century. As a system nothing can be more perfect. It had its origin under M. Colbert, in a country where great vicissitudes have occurred, where there have been monarchy, republicanism, and revolution; but, throughout the whole of that period, notwithstanding all the changes and overthrows of Government, that great system of naval conscription has never been cast aside, and amid all changes it still remains perfectly unimpaired. I do not believe that human skill can devise a better system than the French system of naval conscription. The whole naval population of that country, which has a coast on the English Channel, the Atlantic, and the Mediterranean, is under the command of the Government, and in the shortest time and with the utmost certainty may be made available for war. I do not wish to push this topic further, but still when we know what are the means of the first naval Power next to ourselves, it becomes, I maintain, an act of common prudence without the least delay, to do all we can in favour of the voluntary system. That is the object of the measure proposed by Her Majesty's Ministers. This combination of the various bodies available as a reserve, is, in my opinion, the best course that can be proposed. I do not think a more prudent proposition could have been made by the Government under the present circumstances. We are in an opposite position from that which exists in France. The difficulty which France has to contend with is not the want of men, but the want of matériel; our difficulty is the reverse; our matériel is ample, but without a compulsory power we want men. But, still I am satisfied that, on the whole, our plan is best, and that one volunteer is better than two pressed seamen. We have now enlisted and embodied 16,000 marines, who are perfectly trained soldiers, and as well skilled as any men in the army, while on board ship they are second only to able seamen. They are able gunners, and altogether it is a force so powerful and so valuable, that the House will fail in its duty, if it allows that force to be reduced in the least degree and become inefficient. It constitutes the guard of our most important ports—Plymouth, Portsmouth, Chatham, and Woolwich. These shores cannot be easily assailed while you have a force of 10,000 marines ready to go on board your ships. The new combination which is proposed of the pensioners and coast volunteers with the coast-guard, if well conducted, and if the men are treated with kindness, and at the same time with firmness, I am of opinion will render the Queen's service more acceptable than it ever has hitherto been. It will be a plan most advantageous to the country by reconciling an important body of men to its naval service. If this combination should be effected you will have a body of at least 10,000 volunteers established in this country as a permanent naval reserve for the protection and security of the country. With respect to the coast-guard, I would observe that, perhaps, not immediately, but prospectively, it should be made purely a naval force. Some provision should be made for the early pensioning of men who, from age or infirmity, may be worn out. It is of the greatest importance that this force should be available at all times, and that when a juncture arrived there should be no disappointment. The men should be trained constantly at gunnery. The system of gunnery should in all ships and vessels be used by the coast-guard, that they may be accomplished gunners as well as able seamen when their services are required. It is also very desirable that in the principal harbours of this country ships of war should be stationed as quarters both for the coast-guard and the coast volunteers. As to Scotland, I believe, since the French war, there are ports on the north-east and north-west coast where a ship of war has never been seen. So also on some parts of the coast of Ireland, there are harbours where ships have never made their appearance. The people of this country are undoubtedly a maritime people. They have a taste for the naval profession, and have a sort of desire to see ships; at the same time they entertain a fear of the severity of the discipline supposed to be practised in them. My belief is, that if you were to accustom the people to see ships of war, and enable them to acquire a knowledge of the real service of the navy, and to know how much it has improved, how little of that severity they dread now exists, and what are the comforts and advantages which the navy now enjoys—I say, Sir, my belief is that the presence of those ships, and the knowledge of the mode in which the discipline is now carried on would be of very great advantage to the naval service and the country at large. I have nothing further to add. I have earnestly desired to see a measure of this kind introduced. I congratulate my right hon. Friend and Her Majesty's Government in having had the opportunity of introducing this measure. I think great praise is due to the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer in having given his countenance to it. I think it highly honourable on the part of the Admiralty in having overcome the prejudices that have existed in another great department against this measure. Sir, I am anxious to see the navy of this country maintained in all its efficiency, and I am very confident that, although the measure may appear costly in the first instance, yet in the long run the revenue will not suffer, but prosper under the new arrangement.

MR. GROGAN said, he wished to know whether the officers in the existing coast-guard would remain in the service after the new coast-guard was formed?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, that a certain number of the present coast-guard would remain if they were competent to discharge their duty.

SIR FRANCIS BARING said, he was perfectly satisfied that the officers who now belonged to the coast-guard would remain in the service, and he therefore trusted that the Government would behave towards them with liberality. With regard to the plan before the House, he desired to express his entire approval of that part of it which transferred the coast-guard from the Treasury to the Admiralty. The main difficulty that we had was the manning of ships on the first breaking out of war. The House had attempted to deal with that difficulty, but unsuccessfully. The coast-guard, without doubt, was the best reserve the Admiralty had, and he thought it infinitely better to increase that service than to endeavour to devise any other mode. They would thereby create a naval reserve of the very best description. He certainly did not think the revenue would suffer by the plan. But as to the expenditure, he was not sure that the country would be repaid in money. But he was prepared to go to a greater expense for that which he believed to be one of the most valuable arrangements for the naval service and for the protection of the country. He was glad that the present moment had been chosen for the proposal of such a scheme. It might have been taken under less favourable circumstances. He remembered that it was agitated when the horizon was not perfectly clear, and one of the great difficulties they had then to contend with was the effect it might have in another quarter. When danger came, and it was proposed to make preparation for that danger, it often happened that the danger itself was increased by the preparation thus made. Any such feeling at present was entirely out of the question. This country was fortunately upon the most friendly terms with the greatest naval Power in Europe after ourselves, and the measure now proposed could not be looked at with that jealousy it might have been at a less favourable moment. He cordially concurred in the proposal of his right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty, and in the measure shadowed out he saw nothing but what, in his opinion, the House and the country ought to adopt.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that, if the transfer proposed by his right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty were considered merely as a fiscal question, and if he had regarded the coast-guard merely as a means of protecting the Customs' revenue, the conclusion at which he should have arrived would, probably, have been that it would be better to let the matter remain in its present position. But, considering the state of the country after the great war in which they had been engaged, and when it was necessary for them, in making a transition from war to peace to consider in what manner it would be possible to place the defensive resources of the country on the most efficient footing, it was necessary to decide what provision could be made that would be consistent with the efficiency of the naval force of the country. In arriving at a conclusion upon that subject, the present state of the coast-guard, and the possibility of using it as a means of manning the navy, and also for training seamen, naturally presented itself in a prominent point of view. Therefore, he viewed the question not merely as a fiscal question, but as a question of general policy connected with the defensive service of the country. Not looking at the coast-guard merely as an engine for the protection of revenue, but taking into consideration the other great interests of the country, and making, as it were, a compromise between the protection of the revenue and the defence of the country, through that great branch of the service, the navy, he came to the conclusion, that on the whole the measure before the House would be conducive to the advantage of the country and to its permanent and lasting interest. Arriving at that conclusion he satisfied himself that sufficient securities would be taken for the protection of the Customs' revenue. That revenue yielded at the present time about £23,000,000 sterling; and it was most important that no defalcation should take place in that great branch of the national income, and that its receipt should not be put in jeopardy. But he was satisfied that under the control of the Admiralty the coast-guard service would be perfectly efficient as an engine for the protection of that important branch of revenue. In reply to the remarks of the hon. Member for the City of Dublin (Mr. Grogan) he would state that there was no intention to break up the present force. It would be simply transferred from the Customs to the Admiralty. Whatever changes might be made with regard to particular individuals would rest upon a special examination of their cases, and upon merely individual grounds. No general change would be introduced with respect to the constitution and formation of the coast-guard.

MR. J. G. PHILLIMORE said, he was delighted with the measure; but he should have been better pleased if the Bill had proposed to raise 15,000 men instead of 10,000. He regarded the navy as the most constitutional force, and he hoped that this measure would prove some sort of recompense for the unfortunate cession of her belligerent rights by this country, of which improvident act he was afraid we should still reap the results.

MR. HADFIELD said, he thought the measure was calculated to excite the jealousy of other nations, and to foster the military spirit in this country. He would take that opportunity of calling attention to the necessity of improving our diplomacy, otherwise these preparations would be rendered nugatory. There were at present 4,000,000 soldiers in Europe, and no one could say there was not danger in that fact. He believed that the late war might have been prevented if a skilful diplomacy had been adopted. What was necessary for defence was one thing, but he looked upon these preparations for war with great jealousy. He implored the House to consider our relations with other countries, and that with the wrangling that had occurred with the United States it was important that the mercantile interests should be fully represented in such a dubious condition of things. He felt it his duty to rise and say that he hoped that those absurd quarrels would soon be put an end to.

MR. MAGUIRE said, he hoped that ships of war would be sent to the Irish coasts, as he felt satisfied that a vast number of valuable volunteers would be obtained. He would recommend Government to make a naval station in the north of Scotland and the south of Ireland, as that would hold out the prospect of many volunteers, and at a time when all other nations of Europe were arming it was proper we should arm too.

MR. ROEBUCK said, he should support the Bill, for he considered now that all nations were arming we ought to put ourselves not in a position to insult other nations, but so that they should not insult us. Nations were given to war, and when we saw continental nations making encroachments wherever they could he would leave it to his hon. Colleague (Mr. Hadfield) to say, if this country took no step to protect itself, what would be the condition of the country, and of his own constituents, in case of aggression? It was all very well to keep at peace with the world; but mankind had from the beginning of their existence been prone to war, and in spite of the warnings of very well-intentioned men they had gone to war, and would continue to do so as long as the world lasted.

Bill read 2^d.

Mr. J. G. Phillimore

MILITIA PAY BILL.

Order for Committee read.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he thought the conduct of the Government in respect to this Bill was not wise. He wished to have the causes of the collision between the troops and militia at Nenagh explained by some Member of Her Majesty's Government. He disapproved entirely of the way the disembodiment of the militia had been carried out in Ireland, as the contradictory plan adopted was calculated to produce just discontent. No fewer than three orders on the subject had already been issued from the War Department. [MR. F. PEEL: No!] The hon. Gentleman said No, but he maintained that the War Department was responsible. Some of the men who had been disembodied had been obliged to sell their boots for subsistence. He had received a letter from a magistrate who had been wounded at Nenagh—this magistrate had gone with the troops to suppress the mutiny—and he said the cause of the outbreak was obvious, namely, the bad treatment of the Irish militia, compared with the treatment the English militia and the German Legion received. He therefore hoped the Government would lay the letters written by Sir James Chatterton to the War Department on the table of the House. He had himself no doubt that the cause of the outbreak was the vacillation of the War Department, and its reluctance to do justice, a course of proceeding calculated to injure the military spirit developing itself in Ireland. But the Irish soldiers and Irish regiments were never fairly treated. He believed, as he had just stated, that the Department of War was the main cause of what had occurred at Nenagh, for had a little humanity and a little common sense been exercised, the disturbances and discontent that arose would have been avoided.

MR. COWAN said, he was not satisfied with the answer received some time ago on the subject of billeting militia in Scotland. He understood that the intention of the Government was to assimilate the law upon the subject between England and Scotland, and billet the soldiers on public-houses instead of the inhabitants. He thought such remedy even worse than the disease. It would be most lamentable to place the soldiers nearer to the whiskey store than they were at present, and the Government would do well to abolish billeting altogether.

MR. FREDERICK PEEL said, it would be premature to express any opinion as to the efficiency of the militia. He had already spoken twice on the subject of the occurrences at Nenagh, and had nothing further to add to his remarks while an inquiry was pending. He could not agree in the remarks of the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Colonel Dunne) as to the orders from the War Department having produced those occurrences; and with respect to the impression that any difference in treatment or difference in gratuity was to take place, an order was issued promptly which stated that a perfect equality was to be practised.

LORD NAAS said, he wished to point out the necessity of paying attention to the efficiency of the militia staff. The short time to be allowed for practice would hardly keep those parties in a proper state of efficiency. He did not think the answer of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. F. Peel) was satisfactory in reference to the statement of his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Portarlington. It was too true that the disembodied men were left in a perfect state of destitution, and the officers could give them no satisfactory solution of their embarrassment. That was a plain statement and explanation of the Nenagh case, and he would add, though other militia regiments in Ireland had been treated quite as badly, they had shown no disposition to disorder.

MR. MAGUIRE said, nothing could be more injurious to the interests of the country than to treat the Irish militia regiments as they had been treated. He wanted to know what steps would be taken to give justice to the Irish militiamen, and to pay them their 14s.? The occurrences at Nenagh were solely attributable to the miserable blundering of Government.

MR. PALK said, he took the same view of the case as the hon. Gentleman (Mr. F. Peel), for he felt satisfied no order was given inconsiderately by the War Department. He should, however, be glad to hear how the hon. Gentleman explained the way that the Irish militiamen, with 5d. in their pockets, were to travel home, and to travel back to some place to get their 14s. That, surely, was not a proper system to adopt?

COLONEL FRENCH said, the greatest discontent existed in every Irish militia regiment, in consequence of the way they had been treated and their expectations disappointed. He would beg to ask the hon. Gentleman to consider whether a larger amount of barrack accommodation could not be afforded in Ireland?

House in Committee.

Clauses 1 and 2 agreed to.

Clause 3. (Adjutants, Quartermasters, and Non-Commissioned Officers of Militia, may be employed in their counties.)

COLONEL GILPIN said, he should move that the clause be rejected.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 62; Noes 44: Majority 18.

Clause agreed to. Remaining clauses agreed to.

House resumed.

Bill reported, as amended.

THE GUARDS—QUESTION.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON said, he would beg to ask the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for War whether it was intended, in consequence of peace, to make any reduction in the number of companies, or in the number of captains of companies, of the Foot Guards.

MR. FREDERICK PEEL said, that the number of companies in each battalion of the Guards had been increased to ten during the war, and as it was not the intention of the Government to make any reduction in that number, of course any vacancies which occurred in the number of captains would be filled up.

BURIAL-GROUNDS—QUESTION.

MR. PALK said, he wished to ask the hon. Under Secretary of the Home Department what steps the Government meant to take with regard to the Burial Acts, and what course was to be pursued where the existing burial-ground had been closed and the Bishop refused to consecrate any new ground?

MR. MASSEY said, it was not the intention of the Government to make any alteration in the course of the present Session, but in the next Session a Bill would be introduced to revise and consolidate the existing Burying-grounds Acts. The point alluded to in the second part of the question would stand over till then, as it would be included in that measure.

REINFORCEMENTS FOR THE CAPE—QUESTION.

LORD WILLIAM GRAHAM said, he would beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Colonial Secretary whether it was true that three regiments had been sent to the Cape, and whether that was merely a measure of precaution, or was caused by any immediate prospect of an outbreak in that colony?

Mr. LABOUCHERE said, there existed considerable alarm at the Cape with regard to the disposition of the natives towards the colony, but no overt act of aggression had as yet taken place. In the last despatches received from the colony the Governor expressed his confident hope that no such attack would take place, but, under the circumstances, the Government had thought fit to order reinforcements to be sent there.

THE REVIEW AT ALDERSHOT.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, I beg to move that the House at its rising adjourn till Thursday next.

Mr. DISRAELI: I do not rise, Sir, to oppose the Motion of the noble Lord, but I must protest against the new system which has now been introduced of the Minister of the day giving holidays to the Members of the House, and paying for their entertainment out of the public purse. It is a precedent, I think, Sir, which ought not to be admitted, and the House ought to take an opportunity of showing that it does not approve it. I should have thought that the experience of the last treat which the Government gave us would have deterred them from following that example. But, however, as the First Minister of the Crown has thought fit again to announce his gracious favours to the House of Commons—and I suppose the other House will be allowed to share in the enjoyment—I will not at this period of the Session formally ask for the opinion of the House upon it, but as far as I am personally concerned, I protest against the system. I certainly thought last night it was not at all dignified for the First Minister of the Crown to be informing the House how they were to repair to this entertainment, and what arrangements had been made for the Commissariat, and other matters of that sort. I again assert that it is not at all a desirable thing that the Minister should give holidays to the Members of Parliament, and, without any sanction whatever, afterwards entertain them at the public expense.

COLONEL FRENCH said, that the right hon. Gentleman appeared to have forgotten to mention the remarkable generosity of the Government in giving away what did not belong to them—the Wednesdays. Now, hon. Members might recollect that this was the third Wednesday which they had given away this Session. He wished to know whether there would be any objection to allowing ladies to use the tickets which Members of Parliament did not feel disposed to make use of?

Mr. W. WILLIAMS said, he should like to ask the noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston) from what fund it was intended that the expenses of this entertainment should be paid? The House had had before it neither Estimate nor Vote upon the subject. Complaints had been frequently made of the misapplication of money voted for one purpose and applied to another; and if it was by that means that this expense was to be defrayed it would be most objectionable and most unwarrantable. He for one should not accept the bounty of the noble Lord, although, if every one paid his own expenses, he might be disposed to spend the holiday like other hon. Members. This system of treating the Members of the two Houses was quite new, and people out of doors said it was nothing but a paltry bribe on the part of the Government to influence Members in their favour.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I really think, Sir, the House will not enter into the constitutional jealousy which has induced my hon. Friend behind me (Mr. W. Williams) and the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Disraeli) to think that these occasional military and naval reviews will corrupt the House of Commons, especially after what happened last time. I quite agree with the right hon. Gentleman that it would be very unfit that upon trifling and frequent occasions the Government should propose to the House to adjourn over any business day, and that arrangements should be made for the pleasure of the two Houses of Parliament; but I think every one will feel that to the occasion of the great review of the naval forces which had been assembled with a view to warlike operations, but which fortunately were not required for that object, and to the present occasion, when our brave troops have returned from the Crimea and when so much interest has by every one been displayed in them, that objection will not apply. I really think, Sir, that these criticisms of the right hon. Gentleman are not in good taste. The right hon. Gentleman thinks that it was unbecoming of a person who has the honour to fill the situation which I now hold to explain the arrangements which had been made. The time was very short, and I think that, if I had not taken the opportunity of giving that explanation, I should have been reproached with keeping Members in ignorance of the steps which they ought to take in order to be present at the review which Her Majesty is about to attend. With regard, Sir, to the question of my hon. and gallant Friend (Colonel French), I am afraid that it has not been in the power of the War Department to make arrangements for the conveyance of ladies. It has been difficult to obtain carriages to convey the Members of the two Houses from the railway station to the camp, and I am afraid that ladies, unless they took their own carriages, and were thus independent of the assistance of the Government, would be exposed to great inconvenience. With regard to the fund from which the expense is to be defrayed, my hon. Friend (Mr. W. Williams) must be aware that there is annually voted a considerable sum on account of civil contingencies, to provide for unforeseen expenses. That is the Vote out of which this very small expense—I can assure my hon. Friend that it will be very small—will be defrayed. We shall be exceedingly sorry not to have the pleasure of my hon. Friend's company to-morrow, but I hope he will relent and accept the treat without feeling that he will lay himself under an obligation to the country by availing himself of the special train.

MR. HENLEY: I must say, Sir, that I for one enter my protest against the payment of expenses of this sort by the Government. It is making a beginning. If the House chooses to adjourn for a particular festival or for any great spectacle, well and good. That is for its consideration according to the business which it has to perform; but I very much agree with what was said by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Wiltshire (Mr. S. Herbert) on a former occasion. I think that if we go as a House we ought to go as a body; if we go as private gentlemen we ought to pay our own expenses. If we may compare great things to small, we are getting very much into the way of that with which so much fault was at one time found—churchwardens and overseers having a dinner at the expense of the parishioners. I do not think we ought to make such a beginning, and I for one protest against it, because, what is very becoming to-day, lays the foundation for something less becoming to-morrow, and so we go on. I, therefore, cordially agree with all that has been said by my right hon. Friend (Mr. Disraeli), and for one object to the payment of these expenses by the country.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he thought that the objections would be met by each Member paying his own railway fare.

Subject dropped.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS AND THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. J. D. FITZGERALD): Mr. Speaker, I take advantage of the Motion for the adjournment of the House to fulfil the pledge which I gave last night, that I would call attention to the charges made by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Napier) and the Master of the Rolls of Ireland, relative to the escape from justice of a Member of this House charged with crime. I rise to perform a duty which I believe that every Member of this House owes not alone to himself but to the assembly of which he is a Member—namely, if a charge is made affecting his personal character, his conduct as a Member of this House, or his honour, to take the earliest opportunity of making to the House the statement which may relieve him from such imputations. Sir, I have lost not a moment in adopting this course, although I stand in the peculiar position that I am not at this moment aware that I have before me any assailants; for the right hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Napier) has adopted the singular course, that while he has insinuated a charge he declines to make it until he has heard the defence. Now, Sir, if I could have brought this question before the House in any shape in which it could have dealt with it—if there had been any breach of privilege, or if I could have brought it forward in any other tangible shape, I should—although the right hon. and learned Gentleman has shrunk from the performance of that which he undertook—have felt it my duty to take that course. But, Sir, it was not open to me to do so. There was no Motion which I could make, and I was forced into the position that I must either rest, probably until next Session, under the imputations which have been cast upon me as a Member of Her Majesty's Government and as a Member of this House, or I must take this opportunity of relieving myself from those charges. I willingly take the latter course, and I am much mistaken if, before I sit down, every Member of this House who is influenced by the honour by which a Gentleman ought to be influenced, and by the candour which is due to that character, does not say that my exculpation is full and complete. In order that the House may understand my observations it will be well that I should, before proceeding to that exculpation, refer very briefly to what has taken place and to what is the grave imputation which has been cast upon me. The House will recollect that in consequence of some observations which fell from the Master of the Rolls of Ireland—fell from the judicial bench on the morning of Saturday, the 5th of July, and to which I need not now further advert, a question was put to me by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Enniskillen (Mr. Whiteside) in his place in this House. Now, Sir, there has been some controversy as to the answer which I gave to that question. The right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Napier) alleged, that I had accused the Master of the Rolls of Ireland of breach of his judicial duty and of forgetting the obligations which his oath as a Privy Councillor imposed upon him. Upon a former occasion, Sir, I read the statement which I made, taking it from The Times newspaper. I have since referred to three other journals—namely, the Morning Herald, the Daily Express (a Dublin paper), and the Dublin Evening Mail. I have selected these three as being papers which do not in the least sympathise with my political feelings. I find in all of them, not identically, but substantially, the same account. Having before read the report of The Times I shall not repeat it. I will now take that of the Dublin Evening Mail. In that paper the hon. and learned Member for Enniskillen (Mr. Whiteside) is represented as making this statement:—

“A learned judge, from his seat on the Irish bench, had declared that a certain person ought to be prosecuted, and that it was the duty of the Government to consider the propriety of such prosecution. Now, it might hereafter be matter for serious consideration if, as had been stated, and stated also judicially, that the principal in these transactions, after having been allowed to walk about for some days subsequently unmolested, had finally left the country—it might, he would say, be matter for investigation how far the Government were responsible for not having acted upon the admonition thus judicially given to them.”

There we find the hon. and learned Gentleman referring to a statement which had been made by the Master of the Rolls on the 5th of July, and putting forward a charge founded upon that statement, that the Government, or rather myself as its responsible officer, had been guilty of a dereliction of duty. It was in answering that question, the first upon the subject which I had answered, that I made the statement out of which this controversy has arisen. According to the Dublin Evening Mail, my answer, after stating the facts, was this:—

“Now, if the Master of the Rolls had adopted the course which became him, he ought to have made an order directing the evidence to be laid before the Attorney General, or, in his capacity of a Privy Councillor, he ought to have waited upon his Excellency the Lord Lieutenant and apprised him that materials were before him to enable him to declare that a Member of Parliament had been guilty of a serious breach of trust.”

That is as nearly as possible, if not quite, identical with the language of The Times. I have compared with it the reports of the Morning Herald and the Daily Express, and they give the same account of the matter. So that my recollection of what I intended to say, and what I believe I did say, is corroborated by four newspapers,—that I did not even allude to the oath of the Master of the Rolls; that I stated that he might, according to his judicial privilege, have communicated with me or my colleague the Solicitor General for Ireland, or have made an order that the evidence should be laid before us; or that he might, having, in virtue of his privilege as a Privy Councillor, access to the Lord Lieutenant, have waited upon his Excellency, and have communicated to him the fact that there were before him materials for declaring that a great crime had been committed. Now, Sir, when I was charged with having been the means of procuring, or at least with having connived at the escape of James Sadleir, I at once repudiated the imputation, and said that, if he had evaded justice, my inference was, that he had fled, being frightened from the country by the remarks of the Master of the Rolls, which I characterised as “irregular.” Unfortunately, I had not the advantage of seeing in the House on that evening any members of the Equity bar, but, had any such been present, I should have confidently appealed to them to say whether, in applying the term "irregular" to the observations of the Master of the Rolls, I did not use a mild and mitigated expression. On the following Monday the hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. G. H. Moore), taking his tone from the Master of the Rolls, and assuming that the Government had connived at the escape of James Sadleir, asked me a question on the subject. Though the language used was somewhat irritating, I endeavoured to reply with moderation, and I will read to the House my answer, as I find it reported in The Times of the 8th of July:—

"From the earliest moment that this case had been brought under his attention, as the executive officer of the Crown, he had taken the most active steps to prevent Mr. Sadleir leaving Ireland, even before he was in a position to issue a warrant against him; and from the report of the officers employed he had reason to believe that he had not left Ireland since the 17th or 18th of June. If he had left Ireland, it was before that date, and in consequence of the irregular observations of the Master of the Rolls."

The House, I trust, will do me the justice to observe that there is no reference in those words to the conduct of the Master of the Rolls, either as a Judge or a Privy Councillor, beyond the simple fact of my applying to his observations the term "irregular." But it now appears that the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin lost no time in communicating on the subject of my reply with the Master of the Rolls; and for the character of that learned Judge I do most earnestly hope that some erroneous representation of what did take place was made to him. I trust that he was induced to take the course which he has pursued, not by an accurate version of the facts, but by some misrepresentation which led him to believe that his character as a Judge was assailed, and that his honour as a gentleman was called in question by the discreditable imputation of having disregarded the sacred obligation of his oath. The House will be good enough to remember that, in citing documentary evidence I have taken care to select my extracts from newspapers, which have no political sympathy with the party to which I belong. The quotation I am now about to make is from the Dublin Daily Express, a journal which I need scarcely say has not the slightest sympathy with the Liberal party. The Dublin Daily Express, of the 8th July, contains a report of the proceedings in the Rolls Court on the preceding day, and the Master of the Rolls is represented to have expressed himself as follows—

"May I now inquire, on the part of the public, whether informations have been sworn in respect of the facts disclosed in this case? If so, have any effectual or bona fide steps been taken to make any of the parties implicated amenable? Is it intended to prefer a bill of indictment at the next Clonmel assizes, where some of the overt acts were committed? May I further inquire what is the duty of a privy councillor?"

Having read extracts from Blackstone's definition of the duties of a Privy Councillor, he goes on to ask—

"Is there anything in the duty, as thus stated, requiring a Privy Councillor to obtrude his advice secretly and unasked, where the responsible advisers of the Government remain passive, and where the general facts were matter of public notoriety, and the details established by the affidavits and documents as much open to the responsible advisers of the Government as they were to me?"

He then makes this statement—

"I did not obtrude advice or information privately, first, because it was no part of my duty; and, secondly, because I believed then, and believe now, that it would have received no attention whatever from the Government for reasons which the public well know. I shall only add that if no bona fide proceedings be taken at the next Clonmel assizes, the result will be that the duty of a Privy Councillor and the nature and meaning of the oath will possibly meet with more discussion than the Irish Government may be aware of. There is one other matter which I omitted to advert to in giving judgment, and that is the examination of Mr. James Sadleir by the Master in his private chamber, no other person, as I understand, having been present, except the official manager and his counsel and solicitor. That proceeding has been much disapproved of, and I am satisfied that the Master would now concur with me that it is to be regretted it took place."

I have no doubt that the hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. G. H. Moore) put upon the language of the Master of the Rolls a correct interpretation when he stated that the reasons why the representations of the Master of the Rolls would fail to command the attention of the Government, was that the Government shrink from making James Sadleir amenable, because they knew that, if they attempted to do so, secrets would come to light which would be little creditable to themselves. I must beg hon. Members to observe that the expressions which are liable to this construction did not occur in the delivery of a judgment, but were gratuitous statements of the Master of the Rolls, and entirely uncalled for. In the Evening Mail of July 9 I find that the Master of the Rolls is represented as having made the following remarks—

"In consequence of an accusation which the Attorney General has made against me I shall forward to London, by this night's post or tomorrow morning, a statement in my own vindication, and I regret that in defending myself I shall be under the necessity of bringing a very serious charge against the Attorney General. I shall on Friday state in court what that charge is; and I shall make no statement which I shall not be prepared to prove before a Committee of either House of Parliament."

That statement which was afterwards read in Court, I infer to be the same that reached the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Napier) on the 11th of July. The Master of the Rolls there remarks that I accused him of a breach of duty. Sir, I distinctly disclaim any such accusation. The Master of the Rolls is the Judge of an Equity Court, and in reference to the criminal proceedings of the country has no duty to perform. If in the course of a case heard before him he should be led to the conclusion that a witness has committed perjury, he has a right to direct a prosecution; or if a forged instrument be produced, he may communicate with the law Officers of the Crown, and order that the document shall be placed in the hands of the Crown Solicitor with a view to a prosecution. These are his rights and privileges, but he has no duty as regards the institution of criminal proceedings. If he or any other Equity Judge discloses to the law officers of the Crown, or to the responsible officers of the executive Government, any information leading to the inference that a crime has been committed, he certainly does an act for which the country should feel grateful to him; but he has no duty to perform in that respect. I am sure the hon. and learned Member for Wallingford (Mr. Malins) will bear me out when I say that in Courts of Equity circumstances are every day disclosed, either as to the mode in which deeds are got up, or with reference to the conduct of particular transactions, which might expose the persons concerned to a prosecution for conspiracy; but it is not usual for the presiding Judge either to direct a prosecution, or to take active steps in the preparation of one. On Friday, the 11th of July, a charge is made specifically against me by the Master of the Rolls, who delivers it from the bench of justice, in the presence of a Court crowded to excess with persons induced to attend by the notice previously given. The Dublin Evening Mail contains a report of what the Master of the Rolls said on that occasion; and that it is a true version is very likely, for I am authoritatively assured that it was not printed from notes taken in the Court, but from a manuscript furnished previously either by the Master of the Rolls himself, or by some friend acting on his behalf. That this was the fact seems to be corroborated by the circumstance that printed slips of the Master's speech from the bench were circulated immediately after the speech had been delivered. At all events, there appeared in the Dublin Evening Mail what purported to be a report in extenso of the judgment of the Master of the Rolls on that occasion. But first let me read the prefatory sentences descriptive of the scene—

"We displace from our law intelligence the following proceedings in the Rolls Court, which took place this day. The Master of the Rolls has, in accordance with the intimation which appeared in our last, most ably vindicated himself from the charge attempted to be fixed upon him by the Attorney General; and it now remains with that learned Gentleman to account, if he can do so, for the supineness which has marked his conduct throughout the whole of the transaction, 'The Rolls Court—this day.—The Court was crowded to excess this morning by members of the bar as well as by the public. So great was the anxiety to gain admission that long before eleven o'clock, the time for opening the Court, the doors were besieged by the crowds, who absolutely forced their way in, and immediately every available place was occupied. Shortly after the Master of the Rolls had taken his seat on the bench he proceeded to pronounce the following observations in reference to the attack made upon him by the Attorney General.'"

This, be it remembered, is not the case of a Judge engaged in the delivery of a judgment and to whom a latitude should therefore be permitted. The case of the Tipperary Bank was not before the Master of the Rolls. This is a written statement delivered from the bench, but wholly unconnected with anything then under the consideration of the Master of the Rolls in his judicial character. This document has been published in all the London morning papers as well as in the Dublin journals. I shall not read the whole of it; I shall pass by a great deal of language of which I have much reason to complain; I shall only quote so much as will enable the House to understand the specific charges from which I have to clear myself, and the mode in which they have been brought forward. The Master of the Rolls says—

“The Attorney General for Ireland having thought proper to accuse me of being the cause of Mr. James Sadleir's not being amenable to answer the criminal charges which the Attorney General intimates he is prepared to bring forward against him, now that he is no longer amenable, I feel it due to myself to repel that most unfounded and unwarrantable charge; and I regret that, in doing so, I shall have to put the Attorney General on his trial before the public, and I shall state no fact that I shall not be prepared to substantiate before a Committee of either House of Parliament. On the 4th of March the Motion was made before me, under the provisions of the Winding-up Acts, that the affairs of the Company should be wound-up. In giving judgment on that occasion [a report of which was published in several Dublin and London newspapers, and among others, in the Dublin Evening Mail, of the 5th of March, 1856], I distinctly adverted to the facts which implicated James Sadleir with the gigantic frauds which had been committed. In the Irish article of The Times newspaper of the 10th of March, 1856, there is the following passage:—The Leinster Express, alluding to the connivance of Mr. James Sadleir at the tremendous frauds brought to light in the Rolls' Court says:—“It is said that that gentleman has already fled from the impending storm, but we trust that this is not the fact. The shareholders owe it to themselves and to the cause of public justice that the surviving fabricator or fabricators of the swindling report should not escape a criminal prosecution, and if Mr. James Sadleir and his coadjutors, whoever they may be, have not already gone, it is right that measures should be taken to prevent their leaving the country.” The Attorney General had no sympathy with these poor people, and closed his ears and shut his eyes to everything which was said or written in relation to the Sadleir frauds. The Attorney General, who had fallen asleep from the 4th of March to the 3rd of June, notwithstanding that every newspaper which he took up must have suggested to him the duty which he had to perform, awoke on the last-mentioned day in consequence of my observations, and an electric telegraph message was sent from London to the registrar, or some other person, to know when I should give judgment. Having intimated that I would not give judgment for some time the Attorney General turned his head upon his pillow, and again fell asleep. I am now about to state facts which the Attorney General cannot get rid of by any sophistry or mystification. On Tuesday, the 8th of this month, I applied to Mr. Meldon, the solicitor for the official manager (the official manager being absent from Dublin on business connected with his office), to know when the Attorney General, or any person on his behalf, first applied for copies of any of the affidavits or documents filed or lodged in the Master's office in this matter. On the 14th of June, 1856, a copy of John Sadleir's celebrated letter to his brother, James Sadleir, was given to the Crown Solicitor by Mr. Meldon. Surely that letter was calculated to arouse any person except the Attorney General. He, however, remained as little alive to the Sadleir frauds as he had been before. On the 20th of June, I gave judgment. The result is this:

—The Attorney General took no step whatever against James Sadleir until after I gave judgment on the 20th of June, although the judgments I had given on the 4th of March and the 3rd of June imposed a distinct duty upon him to do so. The letter of John Sadleir, of which he was in possession on the 14th of June, rendered it the more his duty to proceed. When did James Sadleir cease to be amenable? The Attorney General says, on the 17th or 18th of June. I believe he was amenable after I gave judgment on the 20th of June, but I shall assume that the Attorney General has been accurately informed of Mr. James Sadleir's movements, and that the date of the 17th or 18th of June is correct. How does the Attorney General account for having taken no step from the 4th of March to the 3rd of June? Every document connected with the bank was in the custody of the official manager from the time of his appointment, although John Sadleir's letter was not found until after the 3rd of June. If there was any excuse prior to the 3rd of June, what justification was there for taking no proceedings against James Sadleir from that date until after the 20th of June? The letter of John Sadleir, which the Crown Solicitor was furnished with a copy of on the 14th of June, should have awakened the Attorney General if anything could have done so. Who is responsible that no proceeding was taken against James Sadleir from the 3rd of June until after I had given judgment on the 20th of June? No amount of mystification can get rid of that plain inquiry. The real history is this,—the Master had exonerated James Sadleir on grounds which the public do not understand. There was abundant evidence against James Sadleir, independently of John Sadleir's letter, which was not found until after the 3rd of June. The Attorney General paid no attention to the observations made by me on that day, which showed that I had come to an entirely different conclusion from the Master, although I had not seen John Sadleir's letter. The Attorney General thought, I presume, that I should not be able when giving judgment to substantiate the statement I had made; and he remained passive until the judgment I gave on the 20th of June rendered it plain that he must cease to hold office, or perform his duty to the public. It was, however, according to his statement, then too late. James Sadleir, he says, is no longer amenable, and that he has not been so since the 17th or 18th of June; and he thinks it just and proper to cast the responsibility on me that he is not amenable?”

I shall not trouble the House by going through all the details of the argument or the other personal observations of the learned Judge. I think I have read enough for the object I have in view, namely, to let the House understand the nature of the imputations; and from the last sentence I have quoted nobody can doubt that the Master of the Rolls, from the bench of justice, intended to and did convey the charge that, for some reason or another which I suppose he presumed the public would comprehend, the Government connived at the escape of James

Sadleir and forbade his prosecution—that I, as the responsible organ of the Government, obeyed its mandate, favoured that escape, and only by the positive danger of losing the office which I hold was at last forced to perform the duty I owed to the public. I say with the most unaffected candour, that if one tittle of that accusation were fairly chargeable upon me—if I were to leave one word of it unanswered, I should be utterly unfit for the office now entrusted to me. Let me tell the House what interpretation was put upon the language of the Master of the Rolls. I believe that in the entire history of jurisprudence—in the annals of any Court of Justice in this country, you will look in vain for a parallel to the proceeding of the Irish Master of the Rolls on the 11th of July. I would confidently appeal to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxford (Mr. Cardwell), who avowed himself, the other night, a friend of the Master of the Rolls—I would appeal to him, although I cannot call him my friend, as a gentleman and a man of candour, which I know him to be, whether he can stand up in his place in this House and—I will not say defend, but—palliate or excuse the unprecedented course taken by this learned Judge. Indeed, I have endeavoured to bring myself to the conclusion that the Master of the Rolls must have been irritated and excited by some gross misrepresentation of what occurred in this Assembly a few days previously, and that if he had known what really took place, he never could have allowed himself such extraordinary licence. I shall read from a Dublin paper of the following morning the construction given to the language of this learned Judge, and to the charge from which I have to vindicate myself. On Saturday, the 12th of July, alluding to the transaction before the Master of the Rolls, this journal says:—

“We have no hesitation in stating our deliberate belief, and in declaring that it is the conviction of all men in the country—lay and professional—that the Attorney General has delayed and declined to prosecute, and has permitted to escape a transportable felon, and that he has done so for private or party motives.”

Sir, I think it is impossible for any Gentleman in this House to be called upon to repel an accusation more grave or to be charged with conduct more base or more abominable than that here ascribed to me. With these preliminary remarks I shall now proceed to state to the House the course which I have pursued, and to offer that complete exculpation of myself which I am enabled to submit. I refer, in the first place, to the 4th of March, as the earliest date in this case. One of the imputations cast upon me by the learned Judge is, that on that day he pronounced a judgment which ought to have roused me from my torpor, and taught me my duty to the public. I have searched for that judgment, and I now extract it from The Times—a journal from which I hope I shall be excused for making most of my quotations. The death of the unhappy gentleman who committed suicide in London in February last, led to disclosures with which at present we have nothing to do. It is, however, placed beyond a doubt that that unfortunate man was guilty of the grossest crime—forgery and frauds of various descriptions; and shortly after his decease the Tipperary Bank, with which he had been connected, and to which he was indebted to an amount exceeding £200,000, stopped payment. The consequence was that one of the shareholders presented a petition to the Court of Chancery under the Winding-up Act, with the view of having the Bank dissolved, its property, such as it was, realised, and the deficiency made good from among the contributories. This petition came in the ordinary course before the Master of the Rolls on the 4th March; and it appearing from the affidavits before him that the proceedings were promoted by the solicitor who had previously acted as solicitor for James Sadleir, the Master of the Rolls, in giving his judgment, observed—

“The late John Sadleir was permitted by his brother, the sole director and manager of the bank, to overdraw his account to the extent of £200,000, without the knowledge, consent, or privity of a single other contributory or creditor, so far as this Court has heard or knows. The liabilities of the bank are altogether, in round numbers, £400,000; it was in a state of the most hopeless insolvency on the 1st of February last, and the assets are not pretended to be more, in round numbers, than £35,000.”

This is the judgment to which the Master of the Rolls subsequently referred, and which I did not see until, in consequence of his observations the other day, I looked for it, and found it. It may be matter of blame in me, holding the office which I do, that I did not read the Irish papers so regularly as I ought to have done; but I can only state that, up to the time when my attention was first called to this judgment, I had never seen it. Assuming, then, that the circumstances stated by the Master of the Rolls were perfectly true, such is the defective state of the law, that James Sadleir does not appear, upon that statement, to be guilty of any offence that would bring him within the reach of the criminal law. The charges against him were twofold. First, that, being the managing director of the Tipperary Bank, he had been guilty of a gross breach of trust, in permitting his brother to obtain assets of the bank to an amount exceeding the sum of £200,000. No doubt that was a gross breach of trust with regard to the shareholders of the bank and its creditors, but, like many other breaches of trust, it did not bring James Sadleir within reach of the criminal law. It was said, secondly, that James Sadleir prepared the flourishing but false statement issued in the month of February; but, assuming that charge to be true, it would not render him amenable to a court of criminal jurisprudence. The result of investigation has been to show that the criminal law of the country is, in this respect, in a most unsatisfactory state. You cannot punish frauds of this kind directly, but there is a circuitous course which partakes more of the nature of a civil than of a criminal proceeding, namely, that if parties have, by means of common agreement, effected an object sometimes lawful but sometimes unlawful, they may be indicted for conspiracy for the illegal agreement. I am satisfied that no lawyer who hears me, and who is acquainted with the criminal law, will entertain any doubt that, assuming all that the Master of the Rolls stated on the 4th of March to be true and capable of proof, he had disclosed nothing which brought James Sadleir—however morally culpable—within reach of the arm of the criminal law. I have read the reports in several newspapers, and I do not find the slightest allusion by the Master of the Rolls to any criminal proceeding whatever. It may possibly be said that I was chargeable with some neglect in not having read the judgment delivered by the Master of the Rolls on the 4th of March; but I may inform the House that on the 5th of March I received from the Master of the Rolls a letter written by him on the previous day (the 4th), immediately after he had delivered his judgment. I dare say the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Napier) expects to find in that letter some allusion to the Tipperary Joint-stock Bank case. At the time the letter was sent to me

I was—I will not say, on terms of intimacy with the Master of the Rolls—but I knew him, and there had never passed between us, upon any occasion, a single discourteous word. On the 4th of March, the Master of the Rolls wrote me a letter, dated “Merriion Square, Dublin,” in which he said, “My dear Solicitor, I have just received your letter. I have only concluded the business at the Rolls to-day.” The Master of the Rolls had then just delivered the judgment which has been referred to. I need not trouble the House with the remainder of the letter, which was a reply to a communication I had addressed to the Master of the Rolls, with reference to the proceedings of a Committee on the reform of the Court of Chancery, which was then sitting, and of which I was chairman. I merely allude to this letter because, being sent to me as Solicitor General by a Judge who communicated with me on terms of friendly courtesy, addressing me as “my dear Solicitor,” and being written only a few minutes after he had delivered his judgment, it might naturally be supposed that if he then thought it the duty of the executive to institute a criminal prosecution he would assuredly have expressed such an opinion in his letter. As the Master of the Rolls failed to do so, the case was not one likely to attract my attention. I replied to that letter, and I received another letter, written by the Master of the Rolls upon the same business on the 25th of March, stating that he would be in London, and would meet me here on the 31st of March. There is not in that letter either the slightest allusion to the Sadleir frauds or to the duty of the Government. I had gone to Dublin about the 11th of March, and I remained there till the 30th. On the 31st, I believe, I resumed my place in this House. I then saw the Master of the Rolls here, and I conversed with him under the gallery for more than an hour on the subject of the Committee to which I have previously referred. I undertook to procure for him certain papers to enable him to give evidence which would be beneficial to the public. I sent those papers to his hotel; I had several communications with him; but neither in his personal communications nor otherwise did he ever suggest that any steps should be taken on the part of the executive. He never said, “Mr. Solicitor General, I wish to call your attention to the Tipperary Bank case, or to my observations on the 4th of March, which will show you that you have a duty to perform." Well, Sir, on the 2nd of April I was obliged to leave London, the noble Lord at the head of the Government having offered me the office of Attorney General for Ireland, which I accepted, though I did not formally enter upon the discharge of its duties until the 14th of April. Pressing business was immediately forced upon me. I had to conduct the prosecution in the case of the murder of Miss Ilands and other cases at the special commission; and so urgent and pressing were my engagements that I was obliged to sacrifice all personal considerations, my constituents even re-elected me in my absence—an act for which I cannot be too grateful to them. On returning to my place in this House, on the 16th of April, I received from the Master of the Rolls the papers with which I had furnished him, along with a complimentary note, which I am unable to read, as it was thrown aside; I only allude to the circumstance to show that, up to that time, I had never received the slightest suggestion from him that I had any duty to perform. It may be said possibly that the Master of the Rolls did not apply to me previously to this time because I stood then in the position of Solicitor General, but that he would apply to the Attorney General. Let it not be supposed that I wish to shrink from the least responsibility. I accept it most cheerfully. On the 4th of March my late colleague (Mr. Justice Keogh) was absent at the assizes, and he only held office until the 2nd of April, and, in justice to him, I must say that I cannot describe in language too strong the assiduity with which he discharged the duties of Attorney General during the time—upwards of a year—which I held office with him. I think, however, if the Master of the Rolls had thought the attention of the Irish executive ought to be directed to the Tipperary Bank case he would have made some allusion to the subject in the frequent communications that took place between us. I am now covering the period from the 4th of March to the 3rd of June. It appears that the Master of the Rolls having made an order for reference, after the 4th of March the case went into the office of Master Murphy. The Masters in Chancery in Ireland, I may observe, stand in a position somewhat differing from that of Masters in Chancery here. In Ireland their position more nearly resembles that of a Vice Chancellor; they have original and very extensive jurisdiction. The case, as I have said, went into Master Murphy's office, and on the 19th of March he held a private examination of Mr. James Sadleir, the person against whom a charge is now made. I only allude to this circumstance, as showing that if Master Murphy had reason to think that the parties before him wished to prosecute Mr. James Sadleir for any crime connected with the administration of the Tipperary Bank, that private examination was a most unwarrantable proceeding. There were at that time several parties who might prosecute—the Irish shareholders, the English shareholders, and the creditors. Any of these parties might have instituted a prosecution against James Sadleir, but they were the parties who set the matter in motion for a private examination, with the view of discovering property which might be available for them, and I believe I do not make any misrepresentation in stating that at this very moment those three classes of persons—or, at least, two of them—are entirely averse to a prosecution of James Sadleir. Before I proceed I may be allowed to explain that great misconception exists with regard to the position of the Attorney General for Ireland. I heard the other day, to my great surprise, from an hon. Member, that he supposed, as Attorney General, I had nothing to do but to go to my office and write a warrant for the arrest of James Sadleir. I am happy to say that that supposition is unfounded, and that in that respect the Attorney General for Ireland possesses no greater power than the meanest individual in the land. It is one of the principles of our glorious constitution that the meanest subject cannot be deprived of his liberty—unless he is detected in the actual perpetration of a felony—without a warrant, and that warrant can only be issued upon sworn informations before a magistrate. The Attorney General for Ireland occupies a most responsible position, and has most onerous duties to discharge, but generally speaking he originates no proceedings. If a crime has been committed, cognizance is taken of the matter by the resident magistrates, or by the constabulary. Informations are taken before magistrates, and if the cases are returned for trial those informations are laid before the Attorney General, whose duty it is to read them all, and to pronounce his rule on each case, whether a Crown prosecution should or should not be instituted. It is not, however, the practice to conduct prosecutions at the public expense except in cases where the public peace has been broken. It is not the practice to prosecute at the public expense in cases of private fraud. One remarkable instance, illustrative of this, occurred about ten years ago, when a stockbroker who had been guilty of extensive and gross frauds was prosecuted, not by the Attorney General, but by private prosecution. If, for example, a forgery is committed on a bank, the individual or individuals accused are not prosecuted at the expense of the public, unless there are some extraordinary circumstances connected with the transaction. However, to return to the case on the 17th of March, James Sadlier underwent a first examination before Master Murphy, and a second on the 23rd, and on the 28th of March Master Murphy gave his judgment. Up to that date, as I have shown, no creditor, or shareholder had lodged any complaint; no one had given information or taken any steps whatever to put the law in motion, though it was open to any one of the parties interested to have done so. On the 28th of March, Master Murphy delivered his judgment, from which I shall read the following extract:—[The right hon. and learned Gentleman here read an extract from the judgment of Master Murphy, to the effect that, according to strict legal principles, the evidence was not sufficient to lead to a charge of fraud against James Sadlier.] Such was the opinion of the Master, and then he went on in an elaborate and able judgment to acquit James Sadlier of any participation in the frauds of his brother. But the House will remember that up to the 3rd of June, and for ten days afterwards, the remarkable letter of John Sadlier, dated the 21st of December last, had not been discovered. The judgment of Master Murphy was appealed against to the Master of the Rolls. The hearing lasted five days, and on the 3rd of June the Master of the Rolls made those observations which constitute one of the attacks that have been so much commented on. The House will observe that up to this time there was no ground on which to institute a prosecution against James Sadlier; no one had complained or urged prosecution, and Master Murphy had acquitted him of all participation in the frauds of his brother. I shall now account for the transactions from the

"Although, as I have stated, I intend to consider this matter attentively before giving my judgment, still there is one question which I consider it to be a duty due by me to the public to pass my opinion on at present. I wish to express my unbounded astonishment that the Irish Government have not thought fit to take any notice of this case. It is of the last importance to the interests of both parties that they should do so; and if they choose to remain quiescent, and shrink from the duty that devolves upon them, of placing this case before the prosecutors for the Crown, I think that they will be guilty of a gross dereliction of duty. When giving judgment I purpose to enter into the facts at considerable length, and I undertake to prove that, if the Government determine upon continuing to be quiescent, they can have no right to complain if the public charge them with connivance at conspiracy. I repeat that the Government must interfere. They may, perhaps, pretend ignorance of the law that is applicable to this case, but I will now lay it down for them distinctly."

That statement appeared in the Dublin newspapers on the 4th of June, and the House will observe that the Master of the Rolls says in it he "had a duty to the public" to perform, which coerced him to give such observations to the world. The learned Judge, let me observe, owed a duty to the Crown, and, if he owed a duty also to the public that duty would have been best performed by putting himself in communication either with myself or my learned colleague the Solicitor General for Ireland, or, if there was any cause why he was offended with me, he might have communicated with the responsible officers who took charge of all public prosecutions. In the course which he took, however—in honestly performing the duty which he supposed was incumbent upon him—the learned Judge did that which must have been more successful than any other he could have adopted in driving the criminal beyond the reach of the law. He says I was at last roused from my sleep, and sent a telegraphic message to ascertain when he (the Master of the Rolls) would deliver judgment; and then, on receiving an answer, I fell asleep again. Now, Sir, nothing can be more unjust or unfounded than this, and my only excuse for the learned Judge is, that I believe he must have been misled by a gross misrepresentation of the facts. I saw the judgment of the Master of the Rolls accidentally on the 6th of June, when a copy of the Freeman's Journal reached my hands. On receiving that paper I cut out the statement said to have been made by the learned Judge, and wrote to the Crown Solicitor the letter which I now hold in my hand. Let me state for the information of the House, that the Attorney General for Ireland has under him certain officers called Crown Solicitors, whose duty it is to conduct criminal prosecutions. The gentleman at present holding the office in Dublin is Mr. William Kemmis, of whom I am bound to speak with the greatest respect, and who discharges his duties with untiring diligence and trustworthiness. There can be no concealment of anything here, for Mr. Kemmis is a gentleman who never allows political feeling to interfere with his duty, and I may add, that his political views are not at all in accordance with those held by me. On the 6th of June, then, I wrote to him this letter, and I consider it so very important to my case, that I must intrude on the time of the House by reading it.

"Irish Office, Whitehall, June 6, 1856.

"'Tipperary Joint-Stock Bank Winding-up.'

"My dear Sir—I have just received a copy of the Freeman's Journal of Wednesday, and have cut from it a report of some observations of the Master of the Rolls, represented to have been made in the course of the discussion of the appeal in this case. I annex the extract to this letter.

"At the present moment I am entirely uninformed as to the facts on which his Lordship's observations are based; but I assume that he would not have given utterance to opinions so strong, if the evidence before him did not make it a duty to do so.

"The ordinary course for a Judge to pursue under such circumstances is, to make an order that the parties shall hand over the documents, &c., to the Crown Solicitor to be laid before the Attorney General for his direction, and probably when the learned Judge comes to deliver judgment he will adopt that course.

"In a case, however, of such importance, I wish that in the meantime you should take some preliminary steps, so as to be in a position to act with promptitude and decision.

"I have already telegraphed to you to ascertain when the Master of the Rolls is to deliver judgment on the appeal—my present intention being to be represented by counsel on that occasion—and I desire also that you should put yourself in communication with the official manager and his solicitor, and with the solicitor for the appellants, with a view to ascertain whether they can place at your disposal any materials to guide my judgment as to the future course to be pursued.

"I shall be ready to proceed to Dublin myself if necessary. Believe me, &c.,

J. D. FITZGERALD.

"The Crown Solicitor, &c."

That letter was written on the moment after I had seen the observations of the Master of the Rolls, and sent by the late

post on the 6th of June. The House will observe that this was the only step I could take, and that it was taken within half an hour of the time I first read the observations of the Master of the Rolls. In the office I hold I have grave and important duties to perform, duties enough to occupy my whole time even if I had no Parliamentary duty to discharge, and in this matter I could only act through my subordinates. Accordingly, in plain, specific, unambiguous language, I gave my directions to the Crown Solicitor, and that gentleman followed out with diligence the directions he had received. I received from the Crown Solicitor a letter dated the 7th of June, from which I extract the following:—

"45, Kildare Street, Dublin, June 7.

"My dear Sir—I received your letter this morning with an extract from the Freeman's Journal, of Wednesday last, containing a report of observations said to be used by the Master of the Rolls in reference to the affairs of the bank. The expressions are very strong indeed, and have been a good deal commented on here. I intimated to you by telegraph yesterday, that his Honour will deliver judgment in the case in the course of the ensuing week. That no day had been definitely fixed, but that he would give intimation a day or two before.

"I have only to add, in conclusion, that I shall be prepared to give my best attention and co-operation to such directions as I may receive from you on this subject."

Accordingly, the Crown Solicitor put himself in communication with all the persons concerned, including Mr. Macdonall, the official manager; Mr. Meldon, his very intelligent solicitor, and the solicitor for the English shareholders, requesting that they would furnish him with all the information that was in their power. It is quite clear that I could not act on the judgment of the Master of the Rolls. I had to ascertain that a crime had been committed before I could be justified in putting forth the arm of the law against a delinquent. Having stated in the letter which I addressed to the Crown Solicitor, that I was prepared to proceed to Dublin, I accordingly took advantage of there being no pressing business on the paper for Wednesday, the 12th of June, and left on the 11th of June for Dublin, in order that I might hear the Master of the Rolls' judgment. I arrived in Dublin on the 12th of June, and on that day found that the Master of the Rolls had postponed his judgment till the following week. Now, Sir, what did I do on my arrival in Dublin? I sent for the Crown Solicitor, and asked him whether he had been able to get any information. He told me that he had not; that he had received a letter from Mr. Meldon, the solicitor to the official manager, requesting him to wait until the Master of the Rolls had delivered his judgment, when he would put all the documents into his possession. I then asked him whether he had not been able to get any witness to make a preliminary information? He replied that he had not. Being obliged myself to return forthwith to London, and knowing that my learned colleague the Solicitor General had a great deal of business to attend to, and that perhaps he had not as much experience of the administration of the criminal law as some other legal Gentlemen have had, I thought it advisable to hold a conference with him on the same day, in order that he might be put in possession of the facts, and, being on the spot, might be able to give directions. I have the most entire confidence in the learning; skill, and judgment of my learned colleague the Solicitor General, and I believe no Attorney General for Ireland was ever more fortunate in his colleague than I have been. He was selected, not for his political opinions, but solely for his merit—I say emphatically solely for his merit—and I am happy, indeed, in the possession of such a colleague. I thought it desirable to have a conference with him, and I knew it would be agreeable to him, as I could not myself act with him on the spot, that in the difficult and complicated case which might arise he should have some assistance. Well, Sir, whom did I select for his assistant? The ablest man, I believe, for such a case that the Bar of Ireland could furnish. I selected a gentleman whom the right hon. and learned Member opposite (Mr. Napier) alluded to the other evening as his highly-valued friend—I mean Mr. Brewster. I speak of that very learned gentleman with the utmost confidence, and I believe at the Irish bar he stands pre-eminently in the first position, both as regards his practice and his experience. Well, Sir, I put myself in communication with Mr. Brewster, and solicited him to assist the Solicitor General in this case. We held a conference on the day in question; I unfolded my views, and, according to a minute of the conference which I have before me, the result which we—that is to say, the Solicitor General, Mr. Brewster, and myself—came to was, that, having no materials upon which to form an opinion as to whether or not there was any evidence to maintain a criminal prosecution, we could take no further steps until after the Master of the Rolls had given his judgment. That was on the 12th of June; the judgment was expected early in the next week. At that time no party had been named, though James Sadleir was known to be the individual implicated; but, under the circumstances, having no documentary or other evidence upon which to found ourselves, we deemed it expedient not to attempt to make any person amenable under the criminal law until the Master of the Rolls had delivered his judgment. I set out on my return to London the same day, leaving full and explicit directions behind me, leaving the case in the hands of my learned colleague the Solicitor General and of my junior counsel, together with the right to call in the assistance of Mr. Brewster whenever necessary. I ask any Gentleman who hears me to say whether I omitted any step which the most prudent and most active officer could have taken? But I have not told the House all. I directed that, in order that we might be put in a position to form a judgment in this difficult and complicated case, a renewed application should be made to Mr. Meldon, the Solicitor to the official manager of the Tipperary Bank, for all the information in his power. That was done, and I hold in my hand the letter which Mr. Meldon addressed to Mr. Kemmis, the Crown Solicitor, on the 14th of June, in reply to that renewed application. It is to the following effect:—

“Chambers, 14, Upper Ormond-quay, Dublin, “Saturday, June 14, 1856.

“Ro Tipperary Bank.

“Dear Sir,—There are 150 affidavits in this case, and it would be a most laborious undertaking to wade through them all. The Master of the Rolls will give judgment on Wednesday, and you will then be able to select those you require; I would therefore suggest the prudence of your waiting until then. Besides, the briefs are with counsel, and I could not with convenience give you the copy sooner. Yours truly,

“W. Kemmis, Esq.”

J. D. MELDON.

That letter is dated the 14th of June, and yet the Master of the Rolls makes it a charge against me that having been roused from my sleep on the 3rd of June, I did nothing until he had delivered his judgment on the 20th. If I did nothing it was because there was no information available, because I could not obtain possession of the documents, because on two occasions Mr. Meldon, the solicitor to the official manager, told us to wait until the Master of the Rolls had delivered his judgment, when we could obtain a knowledge of all the facts. But the House will perceive that it is not correct to say that I took no steps between the 3rd of June and the 20th. In addition to what I have already told the House, I have to state that, in consequence of an application to another gentleman, a brief of the affidavits was prepared on the 15th of June, and was with me in London shortly afterwards. It was not a pleasant duty to perform, but I read the whole of the 150 affidavits—I waded through every one of them. Moreover, Mr. Kemmis having got a copy of the remarkable letter from John Sadleir to his brother, James Sadleir, which was discovered somehow or other on the 15th of June, sent it to me in London. I received it on the 16th, and the moment I read it I saw it was a very important document, and might probably be made the ground of a proceeding against James Sadleir. Still nothing effectual could be done until the Master of the Rolls had delivered his judgment, because until then Mr. Meldon would not give the Crown Solicitor the documents; and though the letter of John Sadleir might form the foundation of any proceeding that might be ultimately adopted, yet by itself it was worth nothing, being merely evidence of a previous agreement between the two brothers for the accomplishment of a fraudulent purpose. On the same day—the 16th of June—I wrote to the Crown Solicitor to the above effect, and in that letter, after some directions with which I need not trouble the House, I said, “I shall be ready to proceed to Dublin when required, and in the meantime would desire to be kept fully informed of the proceedings.” I could only act through my subordinates; I was obliged to leave the case in their hands, always subject, of course, to my directions, requesting them at the same time to keep me fully apprised of their proceedings. Having thus accounted for the interval between the 3rd of June and the 20th, I proceed to state that on the 21st I was informed of the judgment given by the Master of the Rolls on the preceding day, my informant being Mr. Thomas Kemmis, Crown Solicitor on the Leinster circuit, and son of the gentleman to whom I have so frequently referred. Mr. Thomas Kemmis is a gentleman of whom I would desire to speak with the greatest respect. He was appointed by the right hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Napier), and one of my first acts in this House was to bring under its notice the circumstances connected with his appointment, which I believe I ventured to designate as a “job.” On that occasion, however, I took care not to disparage the character of Mr. Kemmis, and I am bound to say that I have never met with a more active, intelligent, or efficient public servant. During the progress of this case I have received from him the most valuable assistance, although it was not in the line of his duty. On the 21st, as I have said, I received a letter from him containing his description of the judgment of the Master of the Rolls, delivered on the previous day, and stating that he had sent me a copy of the Evening Mail containing the judgment in full. The Evening Mail did not arrive, but without waiting until it reached me, I despatched a letter to Mr. Kemmis, by the earliest post, containing the following instructions:—

“Irish Office, Whitehall, June 21, (2-30).

“Tipperary Joint-stock Bank.

“I have just received yours of yesterday, but the copy of the Mail containing report of judgment has not arrived.

“I entirely approve of the course pursued by Mr. Donohoe, and of your having a conference with Mr. Solicitor and Mr. Brewster.

“With my imperfect knowledge of the case, it would be dangerous if I were to attempt from this place to direct proceedings; you had better, therefore, receive your immediate directions from Mr. Solicitor, but keep me as far as possible apprised of all steps to be taken.

“It seems to me that there is a case on which Mr. James Sadleir may and ought to be prosecuted for a conspiracy, and that it is of that magnitude and serious character as to render it expedient that the prosecution should be at the instance of the Crown, and under the direction of the Attorney General.

“The question of venue is, then, to be considered; as yet I see no evidence of an overt act, in pursuance of the conspiracy committed elsewhere in Ireland, than in the South Riding of the county of Tipperary.

“If the trial is to take place there, can you be ready in time for approaching assizes at Clonmel? For many reasons it would be desirable that this case should be brought to a speedy issue, and not deferred until the Spring Assizes of 1857.”

Now, Sir, I am accused of endeavouring to evade my duty. Here is my answer to that charge; here are the directions which I gave at the time under the full idea that James Sadleir was still amenable; and, among other reasons, with the view of providing this House, in considering the expediency of his expulsion (which would have followed as a matter of course upon his conviction), with the legal and constitutional means of acting as in its wisdom it might seem fit. The House will observe that I say in my letter, "It would be dangerous if I were to attempt from this place to direct proceedings; you had better, therefore, receive your immediate directions from Mr. Solicitor." Mr. Kemmis had also the assistance of my junior counsel, whose talents and skill are well known to the right hon. Gentleman opposite, and are, indeed, beyond dispute. That letter of mine arrived in Dublin on the 22nd of June, and on the previous day the Solicitor General, Mr. Brewster, and the junior counsel, had held a consultation. Now, whatever may be my defects, no one, I am sure, will accuse my respected colleague, or Mr. Brewster, of any complicity in this transaction—their characters stand too high, and the latter certainly is not a sympathiser with the present Government. Well, those learned Gentlemen met upon the 21st of June, they had before them a brief of all the affidavits, and they came to the conclusion that James Sadleir had, indeed, committed a crime, but that it was a crime of a peculiar character—that is to say, that he was chargeable, not with his brother's misdeeds of forgery, or perjury, or fraud, but that he had agreed with his brother to pass off certain shares of the Tipperary Bank to English shareholders by means of false representations as to the state of the accounts, by publishing a false balance sheet, and what I may term fabricated and chimerical accounts. The charge against him, then, was not one of felony but of conspiracy, which is a misdemeanor, the person guilty of it being liable to imprisonment for two years. James Sadleir was not chargeable with the frauds of his brother John, except with relation to the Tipperary Bank; and in that case the crime went only to the extent of conspiracy, for having "agreed" with his brother; because, I regret to say, that the publication of false accounts is no crime cognisable by the law. Those learned gentlemen then came to the conclusion that, though an offence had been committed, it was not one in which the Crown ought to prosecute. In the meantime, however, my letter of the 21st, stating a different opinion, was on its way to Dublin. It arrived on Sunday, the 22nd, and, in consequence of it, Mr. Kemmis called upon those gentlemen to meet again. They did meet again, upon Monday, the 23rd; they reconsidered the case, and I have now in my hand the minute of their conference, which contains matter of such importance that I must ask the indulgence of the House while I read it.

"The Solicitor General, Mr. Brewster, Q.C., and Mr. Donohoe (with Mr. T. Kemmis, Crown Solicitor, in attendance), having met in consultation, are of opinion that though the facts stated by the Master of the Rolls, in his judgment 'In re Ginger,' would, if satisfactorily proved, establish a prima facie case, upon which a prosecution for conspiracy could be sustained against James Sadleir, yet are further of opinion that the case is not one to call for the interposition of the public prosecutor.

"Viewing the question as a legal one, it appears more than doubtful whether such a prosecution would be successful; it could not be sustained without the evidence of persons referred to in the judgment of the Master of the Rolls, who themselves participate in the criminal acts enumerated, and who would therefore be at liberty to withhold their evidence on the ground that it might criminate themselves, an objection of which it is probable that they would avail themselves. It would also appear that the greater part of the information upon which the charges of fraud and conspiracy are founded was obtained from the persons implicated, including James Sadleir, and that they made those disclosures before a Master of the Court of Chancery, in aid of the winding-up proceedings, without receiving any caution, and probably upon a reasonable expectation that statements made under such circumstances would not be used for the purposes of a criminal prosecution. It has not, heretofore, been the practice in Ireland for the public prosecutor to institute prosecutions against persons accused of frauds on individuals; such cases have been left to the parties aggrieved; and though from the extent and magnitude of the frauds imputed, this case might at first sight appear to be an exceptional one, yet as none of the persons defrauded have come forward to prefer any accusation, it seems inexpedient to depart from the general rule. The fact that no one has sworn informations, or taken any step to institute a criminal prosecution, affords a strong presumption that those who are most interested in the matter consider it would not be prudent to take such a course; and though, in the administration of criminal justice, the public prosecutor's duty is to act without reference or regard to the wishes or feelings of individuals, yet this is only within his proper sphere of action, and ought not to be extended to cases like this, where the crime imputed is not in the proper sense one against the public, but a fraud on individuals. It is not to be overlooked that all those who participated in the frauds charged are now assisting the official manager in his endeavours to wind up the concern, and realise something for the creditors; and it is not impossible that a criminal prosecution would seriously affect his proceedings, and tend to inflict a further pecuniary loss upon the creditors and other sufferers by the bank.

"Under these circumstances, and especially considering the limits within which the public prosecutor in Ireland has hitherto acted in instituting criminal prosecutions at the public expense, this case does not call for his interposition.

" THOMAS DONOHUE.

" June 23rd."

That document was forwarded to me on the same day, and it reached me on the 24th of June. Having carefully perused it, I am bound to say, that not alone is there great weight in the reasons which are given for the conclusions at which those three very learned gentlemen arrived, but I may add, that in this country, a Crown prosecution, under similar circumstances, would never have been thought of. In proof of this I may refer to the recent case of Strahan, Paul, and Bates, in which not the Crown but the injured individual prosecuted; and to the much older case of Lord Cochrane—which was a charge of a very grave description, although circumstances have since been brought to light tending considerably to relieve the character of his Lordship—in which the prosecution was instituted by the Committee of the Stock Exchange. Well, as I have previously said, that document reached me on the 24th of June. I read it carefully, and I did not agree in the opinion at which those learned persons arrived. I thought that there were reasons which had been overlooked, and that, having regard to the magnitude of the case, to its complication, and to the shock that had been given to public credit by it, it was a case in which the Crown ought to prosecute, and I did not hesitate, therefore, on my own responsibility, to overrule that opinion. Having, then, on the 24th of June considered the case with great care and labour, and having come to the conclusion which I have stated, I communicated with my right hon. Friend the Secretary for Ireland, who agreed with me in opinion. I did more. I waited on my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department; I stated what my views were, and I added that I was prepared to act on my own responsibility; but I said that as I was overruling the opinion of two such high authorities as Mr. Brewster and the Solicitor General, it was only fair to them that I should have a conference with the Attorney General for England. I called on my hon. and learned Friend for that purpose, but the 26th of June was the first day on which my hon. and learned Friend could meet me. We met in conference and considered the case.

The Attorney General for Ireland

I explained my views fully to him, and he agreed with me. He said, " You are right. You have taken the true view of the case," and by post the same day I communicated to the Crown Solicitor, laying my mandate on him that there should be a Crown prosecution. I stated at the commencement of my observations that nothing in this case should rest upon my recollection only, and I have now before me a copy of my letter to the Crown Solicitor, written on the 27th of June, a portion of which I will read. It is as follows—

" Tipperary Joint-Stock Bank Winding-up.

" Irish Office, Whitehall, June 27, 1856.

" I thought it expedient to have a consultation with the Attorney General for England in relation to the course to be pursued by the Crown in this case. Sir Alexander Cockburn, Mr. Donohoe, and I met yesterday, and on a full consideration of all the circumstances brought under our notice by Mr. Donohoe, and reading the report of the judgment of the Master of the Rolls, and the minutes of consultation held in Dublin on Saturday and Monday last, we came to the conclusion that Mr. James Sadleir ought to be prosecuted for conspiracy, and that such prosecution should be instituted and conducted by the public prosecutor, that is, by the Attorney General. You must, therefore, at once proceed to make the requisite inquiries, and take the necessary steps to have Mr. James Sadleir amenable. The principal informant for that purpose should be Mr. William Kelly, late manager of the Tipperary Bank.

" I enclose a memorandum from Mr. Donohoe, giving a sketch of the heads to which Mr. Kelly's information should be directed.

" I think that it would be practicable to obtain a warrant against Mr. Sadleir, on the information of Mr. Kelly alone.

" I write now in haste.—Yours faithfully,

" The Crown Solicitor."

On the 28th of June that letter was in the hands of Mr. Kemmis; but I have described Mr. Kemmis to you as an active officer—did he do nothing in the interval? [The right hon. and learned Gentleman, having read a journal of Mr. Kemmis's proceedings, which have been already detailed in the course of his speech, continued]—It was not until the morning of the 4th of July that Kelly was induced—and then it was effected by what I may call a sort of stratagem—to swear the first information. If there was delay I do not want to fix the responsibility on any one. My object is simply to clear myself. My final directions were given on the 27th of June, but it was not until the 4th of July that any information of any kind could be procured. On the morning of that day a warrant was issued against James Sadleir, and placed in the hands of the constabulary of the county where Mr. Sadleir was supposed to be, and a duplicate warrant was sent to this country. I myself was not idle in the mean time. Mr. Thomas Kemmis happened to come to London to see a son of his, who is at school here. I accidentally heard of it, and detained him here. By my directions he put himself into communication with the English shareholders. He spent ten days here engaged in the case, and he got it in such a position that, if James Sadleir were amenable to justice, he might be brought to trial at the next Tipperary Assizes; and he will be enabled to present a bill before the grand jury on Friday next, and to get it passed in order to lay the foundation for any future proceedings. He also put himself in communication with the detective police here, and a warrant was placed in their hands for the arrest of James Sadleir. Can any one say, therefore, for one moment that the justification which I have made, based entirely on documents, is not full, complete, and satisfactory? But there is more than this. The hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. G. H. Moore) asked me a few days ago, when James Sadleir ceased to be amenable to justice. I told him I did not know whether he had ceased to be amenable or not—at that time I was inclined to think he had not—but that if he had left the country it was not since the 17th or 18th of June. The reason why I said that was that his place of residence at Bray had been carefully watched by the police by my directions, and the report sent to me stated that he was still living at Quinn's hotel, at Bray, up to the 17th or 18th of June. Subsequent information, however, shows that this was a mistake—that his wife was living there, but he himself was not. I stated also, in answer to the same hon. Gentleman, that I could not exactly tell when the warrant was issued, but it was on or before the 4th of July. The reason of my uncertainty was that, having telegraphed to Dublin for a warrant to be sent over here, to be placed in the hands of the police, the answer which was returned did not state the day when the warrant had been issued. When Mr. Kemmis placed himself in communication with the police, they asked, "What are we to do with Mr. Sadleir if we find him?" "Arrest him." "But we have no warrant." Communication was then made to me, and I sent a telegraphic message to Dublin. The answer I got was "Information sworn, warrant issued, and sent down to Tipperary," but the date of issuing the warrant was not given. On the 9th of July I was not able to say whether James Sadleir had left the country or not, but very shortly after some information reached me on the subject. While in this House I received the following telegraphic message from the Crown Solicitor in Dublin—

"Private.—If reward is given for the apprehension of J. S., the party will come to Dublin and give information of his whereabouts. Answer by magnetic telegraph."

I showed that message to the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department and to the Secretary for Ireland, and with their approbation I sent the following answer—

"Go to Colonel Larcom at once. Offer such reward as he shall approve of. Be liberal."

This, as is often the case, produced no result; but a liberal reward was offered by the Government, who are now charged by a Judge from the bench with having endeavoured to screen this gentleman, lest his capture should lead to disclosures which would be painful. The question remains, is James Sadleir amenable or not? I shall conceal nothing from the House on this point. On Friday last I received a letter from a gentleman, whose name I am not at liberty to mention, which, in connection with another document, gives a clue to the quarter where information can be got. I shall only read one passage from it—

"James Sadleir had not the slightest idea that he was in danger until he read, on the 4th of June, the remarks made by the Master of the Rolls on the 3rd. He came in that morning with the paper in his pocket from Bray, where he was residing; and he said, 'I must now stand my ground or cut.'"

I said on Friday night that the inference which I drew was, not that James Sadleir had fled, but that if he had it was in consequence of the language of the Master of the Rolls, because I think there never was language used more calculated to alarm a criminal, and to show him what he must do. On my own responsibility I undertake to say that the statement made in the passage I have quoted can be proved. I have got a clue, not from the witness, and I undertake to say that before a Committee of this House a gentleman shall be produced who must prove this. James Sadleir was induced to remain in Ireland four days after the 4th of June, and for what purpose? He remained at Kingstown up to the 8th of June, and his last act before he left was to swear an affidavit for the official manager and for the creditors in answer to the affidavits of the English shareholders charging him with fraud, and having sworn that affidavit he stepped on board the steamer, and I am not able to tell what has since become of him. What often happens in cases of this sort has happened to me. A gentleman, finding that I was unjustly assailed, and knowing that he had the means of showing it, like a man of honour, wrote this letter to me, which I received on Friday night last, just at the time when I was ineffectually urging the right hon. and learned Gentleman opposite to delay this discussion. I do not say that the Master of the Rolls intended James Sadleir to flee, but it is evident that it was his irregular and unwise observations which frightened him, and which showed him, for the first time, that he was in danger. This morning I received a letter from a firm in Lincoln's Inn, whom I do not know at all, but who, I am informed, are of the highest respectability.

MR. MALINS: I know the gentlemen, and I can vouch for their high character and standing in the profession.

MR. J. D. FITZGERALD: In that letter, which they can only have written to me from a sense of justice, they inform me that the affidavit of the English shareholders, imputing fraud, did not leave England until the 7th or 8th of June; and what legal evidence, they ask, could the Master of the Rolls for Ireland have before him on that point on the 3rd of June? I have now gone through the facts of this case. I have been obliged to trouble the House at some length, but, under the circumstances in which I was placed, I was entitled, I conceive, to some indulgence at their hands. I appeal to right hon. and hon. Gentlemen opposite, and to the House generally, with the utmost confidence. Can any man say, after the statement which I have made, that the slightest imputation rests upon my character? I cannot conceive it possible that the Government, which I for some purposes represent, can be charged with the base and dishonourable design of endeavouring to screen a criminal from justice. I can only pledge my honour, as a Gentleman and as a Member of this House, that I know of no circumstance which could induce the Government to screen James

Sadleir from justice; and ten thousand times would I rather vacate my office than act at the behest of any Government which could dictate such a course to me. These charges are not only unfounded, but perfectly untrue. I may state, solely for my own gratification, that although I sat on the same side of this House with Mr. James Sadleir and his brother John, they were persons with whom I had no connection, and there was on their part, as many hon. Members are aware, not the most friendly feeling towards myself. I have now done with this case; but there is one matter to which I feel bound briefly to advert. I do not refer to it as intending to make a charge against the Master of the Rolls. I regret that I should in any way have been brought into collision with that right hon. and learned Judge. If any incautious expression of mine has led to that I sincerely regret it, because it is not becoming that I, standing in my position, should be in collision with a Judge. But I put it to the House—did I, when assailed by the hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. G. H. Moore), and by the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Napier), upon the authority of the Master of the Rolls—did I exceed the bounds of the freedom of speech allowed in this House when I said that the Master of the Rolls' observations were irregular, and suggested another course which that learned Judge might consistently with his high character, his position, and his duty, have pursued? I apprehend that there is nothing in the constitution or in the rules of this House to prevent my commenting upon the conduct of a Judge if I should think fit. I believe that it is one of the privileges of the House to call in question the conduct of a Judge; but I did not do so. I used in a most temperate and moderate manner the freedom of speech which was due to my position as a Member of this House. I used expressions which ought not to have excited the animadversion of the Master of the Rolls, and which I must believe were in some way misrepresented to him. But, give me leave to express my regret, my sincere regret and my deep grief, that that learned Judge should have adopted the course which he has done. We are all interested in the maintenance of the dignity of Courts of Justice and of legal proceedings. For what are we all here? For what do Queen, Lords, and Commons, exist,—for what have we armies and navies, but to secure to us good laws, well administered by good Judges? He who brings into contempt the administration of justice,—who in any way tries to cast obloquy upon it, inflicts a serious injury upon the State. I do assure the House that I from my soul lament that the Master of the Rolls should have been so forgetful of the dignity of his position, of what was due to himself, to the public, to the law which he has to administer, and to justice, which he represents, as to have adopted the unseemly course which he pursued on Friday last. Still more do I grieve and lament that the Bar of Ireland, whose privilege it was by their presence to restrain the interference of the Judge—no, I will not say the Bar of Ireland, but some members of it—that some members of that Bar, a Bar that I have so much respected, that I have always acted with and cherished, and the privileges of which I have, as far as I could, supported and advanced—that there were found some members of that Bar who polluted the sacred presence of justice by their ribald cheers. According to the statement made, “when the Master of the Rolls concluded, the audience testified their approbation by several rounds of applause.” Information has reached me that some members of the Bar joined in those cheers. I have heard it with grief, I have heard it with feelings which I cannot express, and I only hope that the statement may prove to be unfounded. I have now done, and I indeed owe an apology to the House at the same time that I thank it for the indulgence with which it has heard me, and for its kindness in allowing me to clear away any imputation which there might be upon my conduct. My great anxiety has ever been to gain the good opinion of this House. I hope I have obtained and shall ever retain that good opinion; but I have an apology to offer, and it is to express my sincere regret that any expression of mine—if it were indiscreet I am sorry for it—should have brought about this unseemly controversy, and should have exposed the House to the infliction of this long explanation.

MR. NAPIER: Sir, there is only one thing in regard to the statement of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland of which I have to complain, and that is, that having such an explanation of the whole course of his proceedings in this case, there should have been any attempt on his part to force upon me the responsibility and place me in the position of his accuser. I became con-noted with the case while sitting here, and taking no part in the proceedings. I heard a question asked, and an answer given, and, according to my interpretation of that answer, I the next day communicated with the Master of the Rolls in Ireland, who is, as I have already stated, my constituent and friend. I believe that I understood the answer accurately. I sent it truly, and I at the same time referred the Master of the Rolls to the newspaper reports. I said that I wanted to ascertain the real facts, of which I then knew no more than the general public. On the following Tuesday I got an answer from him, stating that the facts and documents to which he had adverted were included in his judgment; and he also stated—

“It is new to me that it is any part of the duty of a Privy Councillor to inform the Government of facts notorious to all the world. Every person in Ireland was, I believe, aware of the frauds of the Tipperary Bank. The Attorney General and the Irish Government had equal opportunities of investigating the facts which I had, as every statement in my judgment is supported by some one or other of the affidavits, accounts, and documents referred to in my order, and filed or deposited in the Master's office, or in the hands of the official manager.”

On Wednesday, when I gave notice of my question, I was wholly unaware of any intended charge against the Attorney General. I myself never contemplated, I had no statement referring to any such charge. I gave my notice simply with regard to the question of the oath of a Privy Councillor; and it was not until Friday morning that I received the statement which has been referred to. I then had no authority to use it, except with respect to the question to the Attorney General for Ireland of which I had given notice. I think that had any Member of the Government asked me, early enough to give me time for consideration, to postpone that question, because it was mixed up with other matters, I should most likely have complied with the request; but the appeal was made to me just at the time that I was called upon by you, Mr. Speaker, and in the hurry of the House I had no alternative but to go on. Having no intention of accusing the Attorney General, having kept myself perfectly free from that part of the case, I put the question of which I had given notice, and I appeal to hon. Members whether in the statement with which I introduced it I made any charge whatever against the Attorney General for Ireland. On the contrary, I understood that I was blamed for not making such a charge. If I had been asked to make it I should have replied that I was the most unfit person to do so, because it would probably be attributed to personal or party motives. I thought that I could put the question, keeping it separate from any charge, and I was much surprised when I saw that an attempt was made to force me into the position of an accuser. I declined to propose a Resolution, condemning the Attorney General, because, having held that office, I knew that it was his duty to state to the House the steps he took, the only question being whether those steps showed due diligence. I said last night that if he preferred an inquiry I would support it. He had the right to choose. He has made a statement, and I am bound to say with frankness that, having heard that statement, I have no charge to make against him. I can appeal to the right hon. and learned Gentleman whether, although his political opponent, I have ever, either out of doors or in this House, acted towards him except in a manner honourable to us both. [Mr. J. D. FITZGERALD: Hear, hear!] I would sit down at this moment, and content myself with what has been stated, if the imputations upon the Master of the Rolls had been entirely removed. But having undertaken to appear for him, and to take charge of his honour, character, and dignity before this House, I think that I should not be doing my duty to him if I did not ask the House to listen to what will be a brief, but I hope very satisfactory explanation. I do not intend to defend particular expressions which he may have used with regard to particular matters, and in which his zeal and love of justice may have caused him to forget himself, but I think that he has acted from an honest desire to get at the justice of the case, and of this I hope to satisfy the House. Sir, there is no man on the Irish Bench more zealous in the discharge of his duties, or who discharges them with greater ability—there is no man who is more desirous of dispensing justice in every case, than my right hon. and learned Friend the Master of the Rolls; and I think that, at all events, I shall be enabled to clear him of the imputations which have been cast upon him. It is manifest now but that for the Master of the Rolls these frauds never would have been completely unravelled. It is entirely owing to his diligence, assiduity, and searching scrutiny that they were brought to light. The investigation before the Master in Chancery was so imperfect that it would have covered a charge of so serious a nature that the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck) is about to found upon it a Motion for the expulsion of the Member to whom it applies. For my own part, I deeply regret that that excellent and experienced officer, Mr. Kemmis, did not, on the 3rd of June, go to the Master of the Rolls, with whom he was well acquainted, and who would, I am confident, have given him every information which would have enabled him to follow up the case with effect. All the difficulties arose between the 3rd and the 20th of June. After the latter date the matter was diligently pursued. Had the information been obtained at the former period a warrant might have been issued, and probably at this moment James Sadleir would have been amenable to justice. Now, let hon. Members see the position of the Master of the Rolls. The case came before him, in the first instance, on the 3rd of March. It was not brought forward by a shareholder, but a motion was made on the part of the under-bailiff of James Sadleir to get the carriage of the proceedings under the Winding-up Act. The Master of the Rolls, having investigated the case, said that neither in his experience nor in the experience of any living being had such a gigantic fraud been perpetrated. From the statements before the Court it appeared that James Sadleir had concocted a balance-sheet, in which it was stated that the assets of the bank amounted to £612,000, knowing all the time that John Sadleir owed to the bank £258,000; and that he had transferred to the name of Austin Ferrall £50,000 of the supposed paid-up capital. The Master of the Rolls then referred to the case of certain fraudulent bankers in London, and said, "Nothing occurred in that case to be compared with the monstrous frauds in the present case." It is perfectly true that the Master of the Rolls did not, upon that occasion, intimate that there was any fraud which could be prosecuted as a crime; but what I understand him to have meant to say afterwards is, that if the documents which were in the possession of the official manager had been diligently and duly examined, the parties would have discovered from these documents, which were the only evidence, the means of carrying out a criminal prosecution. I understand from that, that if they had examined these documents they would have found the means of instituting a successful prosecution. When the case came before the Master of the Rolls it appeared to him to have been imperfectly investigated in Master Murphy's office. He therefore collected together all the documents, and carefully examining them, found out this singular state of facts, that in 1855 James Sadleir had, in concert with his brother John, plotted and conspired by fraudulent devices to entrap the English shareholders, and that they had been guilty, at least, of the crime of conspiracy, which was afterwards established in the judgment that relieved the English shareholders from the liabilities of the bank. The plan by which they proceeded was by drawing up a report of the state of the bank at the end of the year 1854, which, from beginning to end, was one mass of falsehoods. James Sadleir having signed this report, they then fabricated a balance-sheet, which was kept in the hands of John Sadleir. By these arts they induced the English shareholders to purchase the unappropriated shares, which were represented as being old shares. They also allege that the bank had paid a dividend of 6 per cent on the paid-up capital, and backed up their wholesale falsehoods by a mass of forged names, forged certificates of transfer, fictitious entries, and fictitious registries. The case was, therefore, complete against James Sadleir, on the one side, for fabricating the report; and against John Sadleir, on the other, for fabricating the balance-sheet. They stated the paid-up capital at £100,000, when it was only £40,000, and the assets at double their real amount. Such was the gigantic system of fraud which came before my right hon. and learned Friend the Master of the Rolls; it engaged his closest attention for several days; it was the common talk of Dublin, and, indeed, of the whole country; and this learned Judge having, by his skill and assiduity, his zeal, his earnestness, and his intense love of justice, succeeded in bringing to light and in disentangling this complicated web of imposture and deception, might, in his natural indignation at the enormity and nefariousness of these transactions, have boiled over and severely animadverted on what he, undoubtedly, thought the remissness of the Executive in not taking speedier steps to bring the guilty parties to punishment. The Master of the Rolls saw that Master Murphy had been imposed upon by an imperfect investigation, and knowing the heartless way in which large numbers of unfortunate persons had been swindled and victimised, his surprise at so long a period elapsing before the clue he had detected was followed up by the Crown prosecutors might, I conceive, be easily accounted for and excused. A Judge more free from political bias than the Master of the Rolls never sat on the bench; he is a pure, earnest, simple-minded man; and he naturally expected that some of those connected with the administration of the law in Dublin would have interposed in so heinous a case, the startling particulars of which were daily published to the world, and communicated the progress made in unravelling it to the Attorney General for Ireland long before the 6th of June. The Attorney General for Ireland admitted that, when the first application on the part of the Crown was made, on the 20th of June, to the Master of the Rolls, that learned Judge showed himself ready to afford every assistance in his power. As far as the evidence is concerned, what is the opinion of Mr. Gaussen? In a letter to the Crown Solicitor, dated June 11, he says—

“All the facts are set forth in the affidavits filed with the solicitor of the official manager, and the entries complained of as fraudulent are contained in the books lodged with me.”

And in another letter, dated the 13th of June, he adds—

“We send also the copy of one of another set of affidavits made by the appellants since the hearing; but we beg to suggest that the books of the bank, and documents which came to the hands of the official manager, furnish, we apprehend, stronger evidence than any affidavit which our clients could make on the subject.”

Looking, then, at the matter fairly, here is a Judge directing the whole powers of his mind to unravel these nefarious transactions. He delivers a judgment which must convince any lawyer that he has no superior in his ability to handle the law or to point out the mode in which criminal proceedings should be instituted; he feels that he, at least, has done his best to discharge an important public duty, and he sees no stir made by the officers of the Crown in a case which has startled and alarmed the country, and been the common talk of everybody. Seeing that he laid bare the whole of this mass of fraud, a little indulgence ought to be extended to him if, not knowing the circumstances which have been stated to the House to-night for the first time, he used expressions of some warmth. Hearing that in the Parliament of the United Kingdom he had been charged with having, either by his default as a Judge or by a failure in his duty as a Privy Councillor, been the means of allowing a man to escape from the country who was amenable to justice, the Master of the Rolls in Ireland, having been the very person who first brought to the light of day the materials for the detection and prosecution of the offender, might well feel sore at so unjust and unlooked-for an accusation. I hope the House has now got rid of this painful personal matter. After the explanations given by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland, it would be uncandid and unfair in me to impute anything improper to him. Since the right hon. and learned Gentleman obtained the information to which he referred—viz., on the 6th of June—he appears to have exercised due diligence, and to have availed himself of professional assistance of the highest character in Ireland. [Mr. HORSMAN here made a remark which was inaudible in the gallery.] I hope the Chief Secretary for Ireland does not suppose that, in making this admission, I do so with any reserve, or any desire to keep behind any insinuation against the Attorney General for Ireland. The observations of the Master of the Rolls may have been elicited in consequence of communications which he received from me—I dare say they were. All I can say is, that I intended only to convey to him what I and several other Members of this House supposed, and still believe, to have been the statements made by the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland. I have only further to add, that I trust the House, while on the one hand it may conceive that expressions were used by the Master of the Rolls, which after the explanations given to-night are to be regretted, will yet believe that this able, impartial, and indefatigable Judge has rendered invaluable service to the public by his detection and exposure of these wholesale frauds, and has been actuated by no other motive than an earnest anxiety to see justice done.

WINE DUTIES.

MR. OLIVEIRA: * At the commencement of each Session of Parliament, since I have had the honour of a seat in this House, I have given notice of a Motion for a reduction of the duty charged upon foreign and colonial wines; and upon two occasions I have been favoured with the indulgence of the House in being permitted to lay before it, at considerable length, the arguments and evidence in support of my views. I will now, if the House will grant me its further indulgence, endeavour to compress into as short a compass as the magnitude of the subject will admit of, the various important considerations which are involved in the matter; and I will, as upon former occasions, divide the subject into three distinct parts—namely, revenue, moral and social points, and international advantages. Without going into the origin of this particular duty, which is of considerable antiquity, and which has been varied in amount at different times and for various objects—sometimes for regal, sometimes for fiscal, and sometimes for interest to promote commercial intercourse with particular countries—I will confine myself to the measures that have been taken in reference to the matter in recent times. In consequence of the progress which free trade measures had made in public opinion as well as amongst most parties in this House, the subject of the wine duties attracted considerable attention in the year 1852, and a Committee of the House sat for a period of seven weeks, collecting information relating to the various interests which would be affected by an alteration; and I think I may confidently refer to that evidence as proving that the present high duty prevents an increased consumption—that a lower duty would produce a larger revenue—that the use of wines would tend to diminish the excessive drunkenness and consequent immorality which prevail in this country—and that a diminished duty would tend to enlarge and extend the commercial relations with foreign countries, and to strengthen and consolidate the mutual, amicable, and material interests which follow in the train of the ties which would thus be created. I shall not trouble the House by quoting from the two Blue-books particular evidence for each of the heads referred to, though I may say that witnesses in every way qualified to give weight to their opinions, clearly established the views I have stated. Convinced that it was only necessary to bring the question under the notice of this House, to insure it a fair consideration, I ventured to do so early in the Session of 1853, when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford filled with such distinguished ability the office of Chancellor of the Exchequer. Referring to the reply given to me upon that occasion by that right hon. Gentleman, it appears to me that, possessing a most complete knowledge of everything connected with the subject, he was disposed to view a reduction with impartiality, if not favour; but being engaged in such extended and beneficial reductions in various other branches of the national revenue, affecting the comfort and welfare of the people, he did not feel justified in effecting any alteration in this particular tax; and I did not hesitate to withdraw the Motion, to submit it at a more opportune period. Since the right hon. Gentleman has been out of office, if I mistake not, from an expression he used last Session, when he designated the "Wine duties the scandal of our tariff, by which nine-tenths of the produce of Europe are excluded from our markets," he entertains an opinion adverse to the present rate of duty. Early in the Session of 1854, I again brought the subject under the notice of this House, having in the previous autumn accumulated a vast amount of information in the wine countries of Europe, and having conferred with several distinguished authorities in France, Spain, and Portugal, by which my convictions in favour of a reduction, were strengthened and confirmed. It happened, unfortunately, that at the period when I was engaged in presenting the question for discussion in this House, there were strong indications of that war with Russia which soon afterwards broke out; and, therefore, considerations affecting the public service induced me to avoid any debate, which, at that time, might have been a source of embarrassment to Her Majesty's Government. I, therefore, simply placed on record a statement of the material facts. During last Session the continuance of the war prevented my giving any impulse to the subject, though I retained a notice on the Journals of this House, ready at any moment to bring it forward if a termination of the war should render it practicable; and I have the authority of the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, as well as the noble Lord at the head of Her Majesty's Government, intimated last Session, if I am not mistaken, in admitting that, if peace should be restored, this question would be a fit and proper one for discussion in the House of Commons; and I trust, from what transpired at a recent interview I had, on introducing to the noble Lord a deputation of more than ordinary weight and influence, representing great interests in the country, that Her Majesty's Government will be disposed to give to the question a candid and impartial reception. As to revenue, it is a remarkable fact, that whilst in all other consumable articles a steady increase has taken place, especially where a diminution of duty has occurred, the wine duties show little advance, notwithstanding the increase in population and wealth, as also the desire of most classes to indulge in the use of wine. This, if compared with the steady progress in the consumption of spirits, shows a remarkable and, I think, unfortunate result. By a Return moved for by the hon. Member for Kildare county (Mr. Cogan), it appears that:—

Taking the consumption of wines during the same interval, I find, by a Return I obtained in the Session of 1854, the following results:—

	Population.	Gallons of wine consumed.
In 1802	15,506,794	7,113,416
" 1811	17,630,185	5,629,722
" 1825	20,853,151	8,009,542

" 1853	27,452,262	6,813,830

So that whilst the consumption of spirits has been, as nearly as possible in the ratio of one gallon per inhabitant per annum, that of wine, which at the commencement of the century was at the rate of about half a gallon per inhabitant per annum, was in 1853, about a quarter of a gallon per inhabitant per annum, being a steady and progressive decrease in consumption with an increase of population and wealth. To show, however, how susceptible of increase the revenue has proved itself when decreased in amount, I will instance two remarkable proofs:—Mr. Pitt, in the year 1787, reduced the duty on French wines from 8s. per gallon to 4s., and Portugal and other wines from 4s. 6d. to 2s. 7d. per gallon. The result was—

	Gallons.
Consumption in 1785	4,064,864
Consumption in 1790	6,601,038
Consumption in 1792	7,851,707

Being nearly doubled in five years. Mr. Huskisson lowered the rates in 1825 from 13s. 8d. on French wines to 7s. 2d., and on Portuguese and Spanish from 9s. 1d. to 4s. 10d. The result was—

Average consumption for five years before reduction	4,781,106
Average consumption for five years after reduction	6,741,855

As a branch of revenue, then, it would appear that the wine duties have reached their maximum, and that at the present rate it is vain to look for any increase. I will now, with the permission of the House, adduce some high authorities in favour of my views. Mr. Pitt, in a speech upon the treaty with France, 12th February, 1787, said—

“We had agreed by this treaty to take from France, on small duties, the luxuries of her soil, which, however, the refinement of ourselves had converted into necessities. The wines of France were already so much in the possession of our markets that with all the high duties paid by us they found their way to our tables. Was it then a serious evil to admit those luxuries on easier terms? The admission of them would not supplant the wines of Portugal nor of Spain, but would supplant only an useless and pernicious manufacture in this country. He stated the enormous increase of the import of French wines lately, and instanced the months of July and August, the two most unlikely months in the year to show the increase of this trade. The Committee would not then see any great evil in admitting this article on easier terms.”

Blackstone (book 1, chap. 8), in speaking of the duties belonging to the Crown, has the following passages, which I think not inappropriate:—

“There is also another very ancient hereditary duty belonging to the Crown, called the prisage, or butlerage of wines, which is considerably older than the customs, being taken notice of in the great roll of the Exchequer, 8 Richard I., still extant. Prisage was a right of taking two tuns of wine from every ship (English or foreign) importing into England twenty tuns or more, one before and one behind the mast; which, by charter of Edward I., was exchanged into a duty of 2s. for every tun imported by merchant strangers, and called butlerage, because paid to the King's butler.”

He goes on to say—

“But this inconvenience attends it on the other hand, that these imposts, if too heavy, are a check and cramp upon trade, and especially if the commodity bears little or no proportion to the quantity of the duty imposed.”

He further adds—

“There is also another ill-consequence attending high imposts on merchandise, not frequently considered, but indisputably certain, that the earlier any tax is laid on a commodity the heavier it falls upon the consumer in the end, for every trader through whose hands it passes must have a profit, not only upon the raw material and his own labour and time in preparing it, but also upon the very tax itself which he advances to the Government: otherwise he loses the use and interest of the money which he so advances.”

Mr. M'Culloch, in his work on Taxation (vol. 2, p. 172), likewise says, speaking of the wine duties—

“Thus from 1821 to 1824, both inclusive, when the rate of duty on French wines was 13s. 9d. per imperial gallon, the consumption amounted to 171,838 gallons a year at an average. In 1825 the duty was reduced to 7s. 3d. per gallon; and during the subsequent four years the average annual consumption was 360,450 gallons! In these respects, indeed, there is no difference in the practical influence of oppressive duties, whether they be laid on the articles used by the higher, the middle, or the lower classes. They are uniformly pernicious and unproductive, whereas, moderate duties are as uniformly productive, in-ocuous, if not advantageous.”

Upon the last occasion that I brought this question before the House (14th February, 1854), I quoted Mr. Porter, Mr. Tuke, Mr. Poole, Mr. Short, Mr. Shawe, and other practical judges, whose opinions given in evidence before the Wine Committee were all favourable to a reduction of duty, as likely to increase consumption, and produce a larger amount of revenue. Indeed, the whole course of proceeding adopted by successive administrations, since the time of Sir Robert Peel, has been in favour of the policy of diminishing the import duties upon articles of foreign growth, and the result has been, as it was natural, a very largely increased demand for those articles. I will, with the permission of the House, illustrate this by reference to the articles of cocoa, sugar, tea, and coffee—

A. W. FORBLANQUE.

Mr. Oliveira

So that, notwithstanding the privations which must have ensued to some extent by the prosecution of the war, in all the articles of primary necessity, little or no effect has been produced, consumption having progressed; but with reference to wine, which more properly belongs to the wealthy classes of society, we see a stagnation. It is very well known that there are, in various parts of Great Britain, extensive establishments for the fabrication of British wines, which no doubt form a large part of the consumption of the lower-priced wines, but which has the effect of preventing any increase of duty by augmented importation. The adulteration of wines is notorious. Without troubling the House with many extracts from the Blue-book, I may refer to the evidence given by Mr. Bastick before the Adulteration Committee, who gave the recipe for making port wine—

“Cider forty-five gallons, brandy six gallons, good port eight gallons, ripe sloes two gallons; stew them in two gallons of water, press off the liquor, and add to the rest, if the colour is not strong enough, tincture of red sanders. In a few days this wine may be bottled; add to each bottle a teaspoonful of catechu, and mix it well; it will very soon produce a fine crusty appearance. The bottles being packed on their sides as usual, soak the ends of the corks in a strong decoction of Brazil wood with alum, which will, with the crust, give it the appearance of age.”

I will also refer to the following passage from the Quarterly Review of March 1855—

“The great mass of ports at a cheap and moderate price are made up, it is well known, of several kinds, and doctored according to price. There is one compound, however, which particularly claims our attention, ‘Publican’s port.’ We are all of us familiar with the announcement to be seen in the windows of such tradesmen, ‘Fine old crusted port, 2s. 9d. per bottle,’ and the extraordinary thing is, that upon opening the bottle we often find that it is crusted, and that the cork is deeply stained. How can they afford to sell an article having the appearance of such quality and age at so low a price? The answer is simple. Wine, crust, and stained cork are all fabricated. There is a manufactory in London where, by a chemical process, they get up beeswing to perfection, and deposit it in the bottles, so as exactly to imitate the natural crust. Here corks are also stained to assume any age that is required. The wine itself contains a very little inferior port, the rest being composed of cheap French red wine-brandy, and logwood as colouring matter.”

together for the purposes of sale. Many exposures of those practices have taken place recently. Since the introduction of the system of Free Trade by Sir Robert Peel, so ably followed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford, I think we have abundant proofs of the wisdom of the system of reducing duties with a view to obtaining increased revenue—and the buoyancy of the national income, even during the prosecution of the war, shows the advantage of those measures. I wish, in respect to the article of wine, the same principle to be applied; and before I conclude I will submit to the House a proposal by which, I think, this reduction might be brought about, by a plan simple in its operation, calculated to meet the views of the trade, and to disturb as little as possible the amount of revenue received from that source. The second branch of this inquiry is a very important one. I mean the moral, sanitary, and social improvement, that may be expected from a more general use of wine; and although I have, upon former occasions, almost exhausted this portion of the subject by numerous practical illustrations, I will ask the House to permit me to urge this point on its earnest consideration by a few remarks from trustworthy sources. Adam Smith has the following remarkable passage in the second volume of his “Wealth of Nations,” book iv., chap. 3—

“It deserves to be remarked, too, that the cheapness of wine seems to be a cause not of drunkenness, but of sobriety. The inhabitants of the wine countries are, in general, the soberest people in Europe. Witness the Spaniards, the Italians, and the inhabitants of the southern provinces of France. People seldom are guilty of excess in what is their daily fare. Nobody affects the character of liberality and good fellowship by being profuse of a liquor which is as cheap as small beer. On the contrary, in the countries which, either from excessive heat or cold, produce no grapes, and where wine, consequently, is dear and a rarity, drunkenness is a common vice; as among the northern nations, and all those who live between the tropics, the regions for example on the coast of Guinea. When a French regiment comes from some of the northern provinces of France, where wine is somewhat dear, to be quartered in the south, where it is very cheap, the soldiers, I have frequently heard it observed, are at first debauched by the cheapness and novelty of wine; but after a few months’ residence, the greater part of them become as sober as the rest of the inhabitants. Were the duties upon foreign wines, and the excise upon malt and ale to be taken away all at once, it might in the same manner, occasion in Great Britain a pretty general and temporary drunkenness among the middling and inferior ranks of the people—which would probably be soon followed by a permanent and almost universal sobriety. The restraints upon the wine trade in Great Britain, besides, do not so much seem calculated to hinder the people from going, if I may so say, to the ale-house, as from going where they can buy the best and cheapest liquor. The sneaking arts of underling tradesmen are thus erected into political maxims for the conduct of a great empire; for it is the most underling tradesmen only who make it a rule to employ chiefly their own customers."

I received the following important letter from a wine merchant of Bristol, named Wall, last year. He says—

"From my long experience as a wine merchant, the reduction of duties on all wines will be not only a popular measure, but will be attended with good moral results. My views are these—that the Chancellor might be inclined to get rid of the Motion upon the ground he cannot spare the revenue; that has been the cry of every Chancellor of the Exchequer, and when they have really reduced a duty they have not had a deficiency of revenue, but an increase. Well, if he will not reduce the duty at once, let him take off 1s. 6d. per gallon this year, and 1s. per gallon for the three following years, to commence 5th April next; if he cannot afford to give back so much revenue at once, let him, if he reduce the duty to 1s. pay back a fourth part every year for four years. Even this measure would be received gratefully, and whatever resolution may be come to, I hope, like sugar, the wine trade will know first and last their position. The continued expectation of duties being taken off, seriously interferes with the sale of wines, and even now parties will not pay duties till it is decided."

That is a fair specimen of numerous letters which I receive from the trade upon this subject. The following is an extract from Mr. Ingham, the worthy presiding magistrate at one of the metropolitan police offices:—

"My experience in the police Courts has convinced me, that a very large proportion of the crime and misery which exist in England arises directly or indirectly from spirit drinking. I have no doubt that a plentiful supply of cheap wine would be found conducive to temperance. During many recent visits to Paris, and other parts of France, I do not recollect ever having seen a drunken man. If my position, as a paid magistrate, did not preclude my taking part in public agitation, I should be most happy to join your committee. I beg to assure you that I most heartily wish you success."

A very intelligent and influential member of the wine trade (Mr. Thomas George Shaw) writes as follows:—

"In Scotland there is an association for the suppression of drunkenness, consisting of some of the ablest, as well as most energetic clergymen and laymen, who have been doing everything in their power for some years to put a stop to this evil, which in many places is destroying not only the mental, but the physical capacities of our northern brethren; but their total want of success has at length led the greater part of the society to the conviction that there must be some other substitute than tea and coffee, &c., and at this moment it is under deliberation whether they will not urge upon Government a reduction of the duty on wine, in order that it may again become, as it formerly was, the general beverage of the country, and knowing that where wine is accessible to all, drunkenness is exceedingly rare."

I have numerous communications from chambers of commerce of many of the large commercial towns of the United Kingdom, as well as from mayors and magistrates. Mr. Donald Nicoll says—

"I have reason to believe, by my experience as a licensing magistrate, that the introduction of foreign wines, at prices adapted for the million, would be a great boon to the cause of morality in this division, and to the public generally."

The evidence taken before the Public-houses Committee of the two last Sessions teems with proofs of the demoralising tendency of spirit-drinking, and the evils of the present licensing system. Mr. Robertson Gladstone said—

"I believe some people entertain the idea that you have no right to select the licensed victuallers' business for the imposition of a tax, and trade should be free. We are now obliged to maintain a police force in Liverpool of something like 900 strong; and we are at this moment paying from the borough funds something like £100,000 for the erection of a new gaol; and I contend that we should not have to incur so large an expense on account of police force, nor should we at this moment have been put to the necessity of erecting a new gaol, if it were not for the existence of the licensed public-houses and beer-houses."

In illustration of this, the hon. Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Packe) said last year in this House—

"He happened to know that in the parish of Marylebone, more persons were in attendance at the public-houses on the Sabbath-day, than in the whole of the places of worship throughout the parish."

And I would further intrude upon the House by reading a short extract from a petition signed by from 40,000 to 50,000 wives and daughters of the labouring classes, and presented to the Queen by the Earl of Harrowby, on the 9th of June last:—

"We believe the benefit of our large and numerous class was intended when the present beer-laws were made. But now, after many years' experience, we find, to our disappointment and sorrow, they work only for our injury and ruin, in every imaginable way, by reason of the very great facilities they offer, and the too strong temptations they hold out, to our husbands and sons to carry the wages, they hardly and honestly earn for the support of their families, to the gin and beer-shops; and that without one corresponding advantage, but rather, in how many instances without number, leading them step by step into crime, and ungodliness (which our own sex does not escape), entailing shame, poverty, and disgrace, upon us, upon themselves punishment and imprisonment, and sometimes an ignominious violent death, and consequently increasing largely taxation upon the sober, and expense of the most objectionable sort upon the whole nation."

I will only trouble the House with one further quotation from a letter addressed to me by the Rev. Mr. Lewis, incumbent of Trinity Church, Ripon, who says—

"It is problematical how far the temperance societies would assist you, but many who are extremely anxious to check intemperance, though they cannot go the same length with teetotal advocates, would both sign petitions, and give money and labour to the cause. I write feelingly on the subject, daily seeing the ruinous effects of intemperance, principally through the use of ardent spirits, and finding the dram-shops do more to ruin, than all my fellow-labourers and myself in this locality can do to improve. Only this year, I have had to bury two brothers about 32 or 33, absolutely poisoned by ardent spirits."

Looking at the deplorable results which are so clearly traceable to the abuse of strong beer and ardent spirits, taken together with the very faulty condition of the law with reference to the licensing system, I must say that I look forward to a considerable advantage to be derived from the measure which I propose; for it is impossible not to anticipate, from the use of wine, the same effect which is seen in other countries—that of an invigorating healthy stimulus, instead of the deadening poison produced by spirits. I trust, therefore, that upon this branch of the inquiry I have adduced sufficient arguments for a change of system. I will now proceed to investigate the third branch of this question—one involving our intercourse with foreign nations, and those increased facilities for advancing the principles of free trade, which, it seems to me, will be promoted by a large reduction of the duty upon wines. There are several countries in Europe which, by their climate and soil, are peculiarly adapted to the cultivation of the grape, and have been so throughout all history. The capabilities of many of these countries are boundless. Abundant evidence was produced before the Wine Committee of 1852, to show that in France, in Spain, and in Portugal, the cultivation of the vine would be extended indefinitely if markets existed for the produce. I adduced, in the Session of 1854, testimony to the same effect from various parts of France which I visited, and where I was informed that great anxiety was felt in those regions for the success of my Motion; that much ground, at present devoted to wheat, Indian corn and other grain, would be planted with vine, if the duty upon wine were reduced in England. In the classic land of Italy there are many wines hardly known out of their respective districts, but which would speedily find their way to our markets, and those countries would, in turn, take from us many of those manufactured articles which they are unable to fabricate. The Italian wines are little known to us, except to those who have visited the various countries of Italy; but their number is infinite, and justifies the memorable lines of the ancient poet—

quæsit

Est nummus, neque enim nummus comprehen-dus refert.

Quam qui sacri velit Lybici, velut æquoris idem
Discere: quam multæ Zephyro turbentur arenæ,
Aut ubi navigiis violentior incidit Eurus
Nosse quot Ionice veniant ad littora fluctus."

Germany produces many wines that would be imported into England at a low duty and become favourites, and the various states of that part of the Continent, who are now our customers to the extent of £7,000,000 sterling annually, would no doubt increase their commercial relations a considerable degree. In the Session of 1854 I gave the House some statistics with reference to the produce of the various wine countries of Europe, from the most reliable sources that I could apply to. I have reason to believe that those figures were correct; at all events I took great pains to obtain accurate information, and in all cases I published the names of my informants. I appeal to those statistics as constituting the best proof that there are to be obtained abundant supplies, if our consumption were stimulated by low duty. I am aware that many members of the wine trade do not hesitate to give it as their opinion that from the late deficient vintages, and the large consumption in the countries of their growth, added to the demand in Australia, that Great Britain will not be able to obtain more than the present supply for her population. I am quite of a contrary opinion. I will, with the permission of the House, give the opinion of one of the most experienced members of the trade—Mr. Thomas George Shaw, who says—

"As to the doubts and fears felt or professed that we could not procure the additional supply of about 30,000,000 gallons, they are too absurd to lose time in refuting; and I even go the length of stating my conviction that a shilling rate, although probably producing a slight rise for some months, would cause such a competition in the wine countries, and the introduction of so many excellent kinds hitherto unknown to us, that the general high standard of prices here would soon be assimilated to that of every other country. I shall only add, that the whole system connected with wine, spirits, licensing, and public-houses, is disgraceful to a country calling itself civilised."—Mr. Shaw's letter to The Times, Nov. 26, 1853.

Messrs. D. and G. Brymuer, of Greenock, amongst many of a similar character, say as follows—

"In consequence of the late reductions in the French tariff, a line of communication between Clyde and some of the French ports will probably be established by us immediately, and as the wines of France form a large part of her exports, it is, of course, highly important to the shipping interest of this country to see these duties swept away, or greatly modified, as they entirely prohibit the great bulk of her wine from coming into consumption here. The salutary effects upon the morals and health of all classes of the change you propose would be incalculable."

All the information which I have obtained from the wine countries goes to show that a reduced duty would lead to greater cultivation of the vine, and a relaxation of the duty upon English articles. Looking to the union which happily exists between Great Britain and France, and the brilliant feats of arms that have been performed by the armies and navies of those gallant nations during the war, it seems to me that sound policy, as well as the courtesy due to our neighbours, points this out as a concession that it would be graceful and proper to make to her. France has already given us an example worthy of imitation. The Emperor has shown a strong disposition to relax the high duties paid upon English goods, as well as to favour English shipping. Several decrees directed to these objects were issued last year; and it is particularly worthy of notice that on it appearing that the price of wine would rise in consequence of an apprehended deficient vintage, he at once ordered, by imperial decree, that all foreign wines should be admitted at the nominal duty of 25 centimes per hectolitre, which had before paid 15 francs when imported by land, and 35 francs when imported by sea, per hectolitre. The reduction of duty upon the same ground, that of deficient supply, must, I apprehend, be equally applicable with us; since it must be admitted to be a suicidal policy to mulct the consumer both with high duty and increased cost from de-cient produce. In fact, if only as a temporary measure on the ground of scarcity, the principle recommends itself, and is analogous to the recommendation of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford, upon the subject of malt—when he said, in 1853, a scarcity being anticipated—

"Parliament had been invited to do that which, in cases of scarcity, it generally did, and to remit for a time a portion of the duty."—Ohan. of Ex., 3 Aug. 1853.

In a recent communication from a correspondent in Spain to the leading journal in this country is the following passage—

"Wine is so abundant in many parts of Spain (Arragon, among others), that it does not pay the grower. It is common in some of the wine districts to send two casks, and get one filled, the other remaining in payment. When the vintage is particularly good in quality, it is not unusual for the inferior liquor of a former one to be spilt upon the soil to make room for the better sort. In the time of the Carlist war, I remember often seeing the soldiers buying whole buckets full of wine for a few halfpence, and much of the produce of the Spanish vineyards is of excellent quality. The Valdepinas, for instance, when genuine, and stored in casks instead of the filthy pigskins that contaminate it with tan, is excellent drinking, and partakes of the qualities of both Burgundy and Port. Had Spain good roads, or, better still for the transport of merchandise, extensive canals, there is no valid reason for her not becoming a formidable rival to France and Germany in all the wine-purchasing countries of the world."

The resources of Spain, in respect to production, cannot be overrated. I visited Cadiz last year, and whilst I stayed there I made excursions to Xeres, Port St. Mary's, and the other localities where the great supplies of what we term sherry wines are grown and made; and I felt assured, from all the information I obtained from the leading proprietors, that their stocks are large, and the increased produce would be very great. These wines are likely to be greatly consumed in England, as they have body and flavour without acidity. The following is an extract from a letter from Mr. James Baker, H.B.M. Consul at Barcelona—

"The subject appears to me to be of paramount interest for Catalonia, where very excellent and by no means dear table wines are produced in a sufficient quantity to allow of considerable exportation; and, though I am unable to speak with a full knowledge of the subject, I cannot but look forward with very great interest to a development of this remunerating trade with England."

[Enclosure to Letter.]

"The fittest wines of Catalonia, for English consumers, are the Priorato dry wine, which would cost at Tarragona, placed on board, sixty hard dollars the Catalan pipe; and the same class of wine sweetened, to imitate Oporto, at eighty dollars the Portuguese pipe."

Many specimens of wine were presented at the recent Agricultural Exhibition held in Paris. From Catalonia alone no less than 103 different kinds are reported to be produced, varying in price from 75 centimes the bottle (about 7^d.) French Exhibitors figure in the official catalogue to the number of 296 specimens. Mr. Louis Cazalas Allut, from the Herault, exhibited no less than 150 varieties, of the vintage of 1847, at 15 francs the hectolitre (about 1s. 3^d. per bottle)—p. 277 of the catalogue; and many of the French wines are marked at lower prices. From Sardinia there are two specimens; from Switzerland, nineteen; and from Algeria, thirty-six. And here permit me to correct an erroneous impression entertained by many persons, and lately given expression to by the noble Lord at the head of Her Majesty's Government, namely, that the duty bears a ratio of 25 per cent on the value of the wine. Now, in the wine above referred to, the percentage of duty on value is nearly 300 per cent; and the same may be said with respect to many of the ordinary wines of France, Spain, and Portugal. If, by the reduction of this duty, a general competition should be brought about, we may expect the production of wine from many other countries whose climate is suitable to its cultivation. Referring to that quarter of the globe in which such intense interest is at the present time centred, I will give a short extract from Captain Spence's book upon Turkey, Russia, the Black Sea, and Circassia. The author says—

"Yalta, entirely the creation of the Prince Worozoff, is destined to be, at no great distance of time, a highly commercial and prosperous city. The harbour is safe, and all that the mariner could desire, and nothing can exceed the beauty and fertility of the surrounding country; for being protected from the scorching winds of the steppe, and the cold blasts of the north, all the productions of a more southern clime here attain the highest perfection, and the wines produced are already so much prized as to find a place at the Emperor's table."

and Mr. Anatole Demidoff, in his Travels in Southern Russia and the Crimea, vol. ii., p. 84, describing Castropolo, says—

"An extensive vineyard, planted in 1839, and stocked with the choicest species of vine, selected with care, receives the ardent rays of a sun worthy of tinting the mellow grape of Spain. To say the truth the wine does not yet correspond to the quality of the vine and the beauty of the grape, but it is to be hoped that such fine vintages will not be lost for the want of good wine-makers to take advantage of them."

By recent accounts it would appear that the United States already produce considerable quantities of wine. In Putnam's American Magazine, published in New York, November, 1854, I find the following passages—

"The earliest discoverers of America, the Northmen, landed at the island where now Newport stands, and christened the New World, Vineland. I am not surprised that the Northmen should have called this Vineland, says an old gentleman of our acquaintance who was born and bred at Newport. I can remember, when a boy, seeing the wild grapes growing all over the banks down to the water's edge."

Sir John Hawkins, who was knighted by Elizabeth for his services in the action with the Armada, still better known as the Englishman who introduced the Slave Trade, speaks of drinking wine from American grapes in Florida in the year 1564, memorable as the birth-year of Shakespeare.

"Landonier says, writing the history of his voyage to Florida in 1562—that the trees were environed about with vines bearing grapes, so that the number would suffice to make the place habitable. Master Ralf Sone, in 1585, commends the grapes of Virginia, grapes of such greatness, yet wilde, as France, Spain, nor Italy have no greater. Vineyards were established in Virginia as early as 1620. Beauchamp Plantagenet in 1648 commends the wine of Delaware (Uvedale) for its intoxicating qualities. A second draught, he quaintly says, four months old, will foxe (intoxicate) a reasonable pate. William Penn, in 1688, and Andrew Dore, in 1685, attempted to establish vineyards near Philadelphia; Kaskaskia on the Mississippi, still earlier, had its vineyards planted by the Jesuits. Fort du Quesne, now Pittsburg, produced its vines and wines under the French, prior to the year 1758. Volney, who visited America in the year 1796, speaks of drinking an American wine at Gallipolis; Ohio. Du-four, in 1796, speaks of a Frenchman at Marietta, on the Ohio, who was making several barrels a year out of the wild grapes, known by the name of sand-grapes. I drank some of the wine when about four months old, and found it like the wine produced in the vicinity of Paris, in France, if not better. In the beginning of the present century the vineyards at Spring Mill, near Philadelphia, and the Swiss settlement at Vevay (Indiana), in 1806, were established. At Spring Mill, a variety of foreign grapes were tried, and abandoned; but a native vine, the Schylkill, an abundant bearer, succeeded well as a wine-grape. This, under the name of Cape grape, was transplanted to Vevay (Indiana), where it flourished many years. It produces a coarse red wine, of tolerable quality, only not to compare with the wine of the Catawba and Isabella. These two vines hereafter may form the great arterial branches through which the future prosperity of the Northern States shall flow, California and Texas."

"Another business, which has grown up almost entirely since 1850, is making of wine, and which promises to equal in amount that of the finest provinces of France. By comparing the statistics of the Horticultural Society with the fact that numerous vineyards have been set out in the last year or two, we may confidently state that there are not less than 2,000 acres of Catawba vines in cultivation in the vicinity of Cincinnati, of which 1,000 acres are in full bearing. By the average production of the last few years, this area of vines will yield 700,000 gallons, and in a very short time it must be greatly increased. Already dry and sparkling wines and brandy, commanding the highest prices, are made here."

Mr. V. Longworth, the famous wine-grower of Cincinnati, has just published an article, in which he says—

"Ours is the region for grape culture and the manufacturing of wine. The wine countries of Europe have no native grapes. Our hills and valleys are covered with vines producing hundreds of varieties of grapes. If our temperance men can be induced to respect the doctrine of the Bible, and not interfere with the culture of pure wine—not many years will elapse till we can not only supply the United States with wine, but include all Europe."

I have a letter from Mr. Frederick Cozens of New York, in which that gentleman says—

"The still Catawba wine will compare favourably with the best Rudesheimer and Hookheimer, which it resembles. The sparkling Catawba has a flavour peculiar to itself, richer, fuller to the taste, and more grapy than any champagne. The sparkling Isabella is still richer. It always struck me that these wines were peculiarly suited to the English taste."

There are two domestic interests of considerable amount mixed up with this question; and I should be sorry for it to be thought that I could pass them over in silence. I mean the British wine trade, and the drawback upon duty-paid stock to foreign importers. The British wine trade has grown up in a comparatively short period, in consequence of the prohibitory duty upon foreign wines, and is at the present time a very thriving and increasing branch of commerce. The introduction of British wines throughout the kingdom has led to a very large consumption of those wines; and it is fair to assume that, to a certain extent, it has prevented the consumption of foreign wines; but I believe, also, that it is very often substituted for the foreign article; at all events, by being mixed with foreign wines in the hands of unscrupulous innkeepers and retail wine dealers—and this is, in my opinion, one reason why the duty upon foreign wines does not increase. Now, if my apprehension be correct, the Revenue is suffering from this process of mixing, and is likely to continue to do so. The British wine-makers view my proposed reduction of duty with great and natural apprehension, as likely to interfere with their business; and think that if the duty upon foreign wines be reduced, that they should have a corresponding favour shown them, by a reduction of duty upon spirits used in the manufacture of their article, which will permit them to compete with the foreigner as regards the cost. It cannot be urged that the British trade has any very strong claim for such an extension of protection; and I leave this matter entirely with the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The drawback question stands upon somewhat different grounds, the merchants alleging that there is a distinct pledge given by the Government under Treasury order, to refund the duties paid upon stock in the event of a reduction taking place. I have upon former occasions referred to this question, and I am aware that it presents considerable difficulty, as well from the large amount that would have to be repaid, as from the facility which it presents for the practice of fraud. I trust that the proposition with which I shall conclude my address will, amongst other advantages, effectually silence the opposition of the British wine merchant, and the importer who has paid duty upon stock. If, as I think, it has been conceded as regards revenue, the present high duty is found to check consumption—if it be admitted that by the use of wine some improvement may be expected in the general sobriety of the lower classes, and that a country pledged to advance in the principles of free trade, we must ere long remove this highly protective duty, and thus promote a greater interchange of commercial products with other countries—the only question being how and when this change can be brought about, so as to affect, as little as possible, existing interests, and those parties whose fortunes are engaged in the trade. Much as I am in favour of an immediate reduction upon all wines, foreign and colonial, to one shilling per gallon, I am disposed to modify its operation in such manner as will, I hope, conciliate all interests, and induce the Government to adopt my plan, by way of settling a question which, if annually discussed, cannot fail to damage many important interests, and to keep foreign countries in a state of uncertainty as to the course they should pursue with regard to a most interesting branch of agriculture. I would therefore suggest, that, commencing from the 5th of April next, the duty be lowered to 5s. per imperial gallon. In the year 1854, the number of gallons entered for home consumption was 6,776,086, producing £1,914,387; so that, with the reduction I propose—the increased consumption to produce £2,000,000—should be 8,000,000 gallons, which I think likely to occur the first year. I would, in April 1858, reduce it to 4s. per gallon; and, if the consumption should increase to 10,000,000 gallons, the same amount of revenue would be obtained, namely, £2,000,000. In 1859, I would reduce it to 3s. per gallon; and, at that rate, a consumption of 14,000,000 gallons would produce £2,100,000. At 2s., to produce the same revenue would require a consumption of 20,000,000 of gallons; and, at 1s., a consumption of 40,000,000 of gallons would be necessary to produce £2,000,000. I would leave the period of effecting the last two reductions to the consideration of the Government, due regard being had to the success of the reduction from the present rate to 3s. Though, it should be observed, that even admitting some small loss of revenue from this source, the Treasury will benefit, in 1859-60, largely from the falling in of terminable annuities. Being persuaded that a gradual reduction of the character that I propose would not disturb revenue, and combine the advantages I have ventured to enumerate, I beg to move that the House do resolve itself into a committee to take into consideration a reduction of the wine duties.

Motion made, and Question proposed—

“That, with a view to promote increased commercial relations with France, Spain, Portugal, and other wine-growing countries, this House will resolve itself into a Committee to take into consideration a reduction of the Duty upon Foreign and Colonial Wines.”

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, looking to the lateness of the period of the Session at which my hon. Friend has brought forward his Motion—looking also to the state of our revenue and expenditure, and to the definitive financial settlement at which the House has arrived for the present year—I think I should be justified in at once calling upon the House to refuse its assent to the Motion now made without entering into any full statement of the reasons for that course. But I feel that the attention which the hon. Gentleman has given to this subject, and the details which he has laid before the House entitle him to a fuller answer on my part, and that I should be wanting in deference to him and the House if I did not state, not at any great length, but with some argumentative reasons, my grounds for not acceding to the Motion which he has made. In the financial statement which I laid before the House since Easter I expressed the opinion that the great difficulty which the financial reformer has to encounter in removing inconvenient imposts and in improving our fiscal system was the large amount of revenue which it is necessary to raise in order to meet our great annual expenditure. It is, I believe, a fact which rests on good evidence, that in the interval between the American and French wars, and before the latter great contest had added so largely to the amount of our national debt, so that at the commencement of the peace in 1815 it had reached a sum of nearly £800,000,000—when our expenditure did not much exceed the moderate sum of £12,000,000 or £14,000,000, Mr. Pitt entertained the plan, as practicable and feasible, of abolishing all revenue raised by import duties, of abolishing all Customs' revenue, and of raising the entire income of the country by direct taxes and taxes upon internal consumption. If Mr. Pitt were now at the head of the finances of the country, he would assuredly find that such a scheme would be utterly impracticable. It is impossible, with the large expenditure which we now have, to raise a sufficient revenue by internal taxation and direct taxes alone, without resorting to rates which would be found most oppressive. A finance Minister is now obliged to produce between £50,000,000 and £60,000,000 annually; and to attempt to raise that immense sum by taxes levied upon the internal consumption of the country and by direct taxes would, in my opinion, be foolish in the extreme. Under these circumstances it is necessary that we should, to a considerable extent, rely upon import duties as well as upon taxes levied upon internal production. But our system of taxation is so arranged that scarcely any portion of it affects that class of articles of consumption which consists of solid food. We have no taxes upon bread, biscuit, pastry, meat, poultry, game, fish, vegetables, fruit, butter, cheese, or eggs; and if any person will confine his consumption of food to a combination of the articles I have named, and will be so sober as never to drink any fluid but water, he may defy the inroads of the tax-gatherer. But in devising our system of taxation much recourse has been had to potable articles, or articles of drink. I will state to the House, in the first place, the amount of taxation which is annually raised upon those articles which produce different sorts of drink, and which are not fermented or intoxicating. There is a small duty on cocoa, which produces about £19,000 a year; coffee yields £462,000; sugar, which to a great extent is consumed with beverages, £4,254,000; tea, £5,683,000. Upon these four articles we levy an annual revenue of about £10,418,000. I now come to fermented or intoxicating beverages, upon which a very large portion of our revenue depends. I will take, first, the Customs. In 1853 the duty on rum produced £1,253,000; foreign spirits yielded £1,435,000; wines, £1,924,000; and I will add to these an article which cannot be considered as solid food, which certainly is not a beverage, but which, partaking of the nature of air, may, perhaps, be assigned to fluids—I mean tobacco, the duty on which produces £4,728,000. These articles together produced about £9,340,000. I next take the excise duties, which are connected with different sorts of beverages. The duty on hops yields £440,000; the malt duty £5,418,000; British spirits produce £6,864,000. There is another excise duty which is producing a large revenue, of which a considerable portion may be set down to the consumption of spirits, beer, and different fermented liquors—I mean the duty upon licences, which yields £1,244,000 a year. Of that sum I am told about £1,000,000 proceeds from licences for public-houses, taverns, and other places connected with the consumption of spirits. These excisable articles produced a sum of £13,966,000. These two items produce the sum of £23,306,000; and, therefore, taking together the fermented liquors, and those liquors which are not fermented, we have a total of about £33,000,000 levied exclusively upon different beverages. The House, therefore, will, I think, see that it is of great importance in our fiscal system not to make any change which will diminish the pro-

ductiveness of that great branch of our revenue. But I would now come more closely to the arguments of the hon. Gentleman on the subject of the duty on wine. I will state briefly to the House the progress of the duties upon wine. In 1794, the duty upon French wines was 4s. 6d. the gallon, and the duty upon Portuguese wines was 3s. In 1795, the duties were raised respectively to 7s. 4d. and 4s. 10½d. In 1796, they underwent a still greater increase, being raised to 10s. 2½d. and 6s. 9½d. They continued at that rate till 1803, when they were raised respectively to 12s. 5½d. and 8s. 3d. In 1804 and 1805 there was a further increase, and in 1813 the duty upon French wines was raised to 19s. 8½d., and that upon Portuguese wines to 9s. 1½d. In 1814, the duty upon French wines was lowered to 13s. 8½d., and in 1816, the two duties were fixed respectively at 13s. 8d. and 9s. 8½d. These duties again underwent a considerable reduction in 1825, being lowered to 7s. 2d. and 4s. 10d. respectively. That was an important era in the history of the wine duties. They were reduced to the extent I have stated by Mr. Robinson (now Lord Ripon) the then Chancellor of the Exchequer, in consequence of its being believed that the high duties diminished the consumption. In 1831, the difference between French and all other wines was abolished, and the duty was equalised at 5s. 6d. per imperial gallon for all wines except Cape, which was charged at the rate of 2s. 10d. In 1840, that 5s. 6d. was raised to 5s. 9d., which is the amount of the duty at the present moment. Such being the history of the duty upon wines, it is important to observe the consumption since 1795. In 1795, when the duties were not very different from what they are now, and when the population was considerably less, the consumption of wines was 8,238,000 gallons, and the revenue was £1,694,000. In 1803, when the duty was as high as 12s. 5d. on French wines and 8s. 3d. on Portuguese wines, the consumption was 8,226,000 gallons, and the duty, notwithstanding its high rate, produced a revenue of £2,423,000, showing that at that time—during the war—the high rate of duties did not affect the consumption of wines, which remained undiminished. In 1807, when the duty was 13s. 8d. on French and 9s. 8d. on Portuguese wines, the consumption was 6,271,000 gallons, and the revenue amounted to £2,722,000, showing again, notwithstanding the high rate of duty, that the consumption remained large, and that a great revenue was produced. In 1810, the duty was equally high, and that was the year of the greatest revenue, the duty producing £2,786,000. In 1824, the year previous to the reduction, to which I have just alluded, the consumption had fallen to 5,030,000 imperial gallons, producing a revenue of £2,162,000. Notwithstanding the reduction of duty which has taken place since then, from 13s. 8d. on French and 9s. 8d. on Portuguese wines to a uniform rate of 5s. 9d., the consumption of 1854 was only 6,775,000 gallons, and the revenue only £1,914,000. Therefore, in spite of the great increase of population and the reduction of the rate of duty, the total consumption of wine and the total produce of the wine duties have diminished since the early years of this century. I think, then, it follows incontrovertibly from these figures, that in the case of wine we are not to expect the ordinary results to ensue from a reduction in the duty, because there are here evidently other causes in operation beyond the mere pressure of the Customs' duty. Those causes are undoubtedly to be sought in the great change of tastes which has taken place in the upper classes of society with respect to the consumption of wine and the greater sobriety of their habits; and it is only by taking those generally operative causes into consideration that it is possible to account for the phenomena which are presented by the consumption of wine in this country. I now come to speak more particularly with reference to French wine, to which the hon. Member for Pontefract adverted. In 1854, notwithstanding the equality of the duty upon all foreign wines, the proportionate importations of foreign wines from different countries stood to one another as follows:—Of French wine the percentage of total imports was only 8 1-10th, of Portuguese wine it was 36 6-10ths, of Spanish it was 38 3-10ths, and of Sicilian it was 11 1-10th; so that the importation of Sicilian wines appears to be greater than that of French wines. These figures, taken together with the progress which has been made in the consumption of different sorts of wine since the equalisation of the duty, seem to show that there is a decided taste in this country in favour of the stronger sorts of wine of Spain and Portugal. In 1831, when the equalisation of duty took place, the proportionate consumption was as follows:—

Of Portuguese wine 43 per cent, of French wine 4 per cent. and of Spanish wine 33 per cent. In 1854, these proportions stood as I have already enumerated them, so that the increase of Spanish wine had exceeded that of French wine, notwithstanding the equalisation of the duties. It seems to me to follow from this comparison, that no considerable part of the reduction in the consumption of wine at the present time, as compared with the early years of this century, can be attributed to fiscal causes; and it also follows that, inasmuch as the equalisation of the duties on the weak and strong wines of the Continent has failed to produce any remarkable increase in the consumption of weak wines, we cannot expect that a further reduction would be attended with the effect which the hon. Member anticipates. There is only one case in which that reduction could be expected to produce any very important result, that is to say, if the reduction were carried to such an extent as to come into competition with the consumption of British spirits and other fermented liquors produced in this country. It is necessary as our fiscal system is now arranged that the duty on wine should bear some reference to the duty on spirits, on which so large a portion of our revenue depends; and if the duty on wine be carried to so low a point as to make it cheaper to consume foreign wine than colonial or foreign or British spirits, or even beer, then undoubtedly the consumption of weak wines would be greatly increased in this country; but, then, let me remind the House that the duties upon those other classes of fermented beverages would, in fact, operate as a protective duty upon wine, and wine would be introduced into this country under cover of a disproportionate duty upon spirits and beer. But, so long as a due proportion is observed in the rate of duties upon those different classes of fermented liquors, whether produced in this country or imported from abroad, I believe that it is vain to expect that any considerable quantity of the weaker wines of the Continent will be consumed in this country. There is one other point to which I must advert before concluding my remarks upon the Motion of the hon. Gentleman. It is a proposition which has been often made to substitute for the present duty, which is equal upon all classes and qualities of wine, an ad valorem duty. Attempts have been made with regard to other great articles of consumption, to impose ad valorem duties upon equitable principles, but have proved unsuccessful. Both before and since I entered on my present office inquiries were instituted by the department of Customs, with the view of ascertaining whether it would be possible to devise any means of imposing an ad valorem duty on wine. None has yet been contrived; and I believe it impossible to devise any system by which the quality of wine can be ascertained with so much accuracy as to prevent fraud, and to enable the Government, without a tedious and vexatious process, which would be far more injurious to the importer than the present state of the law, to impose ad valorem duties. If, then, it be admitted that it is impossible to impose a duty upon wine on the ad valorem principle, the only means by which the inferior wines of the Continent can be admitted into this country, on such terms as would meet the views of the hon. Gentleman, would be to lower the duty to a point which would practically make cheap wine a substitute for spirits and beer, and which would, as I have previously observed, subject them to an unfair competition. I quite appreciate the force of the arguments brought forward by the hon. Gentleman with respect to our relations with France, and I wish that it were in my power to look forward with any hope to our being able at an early period—with reference to the great amount of revenue which it is necessary for us to raise—to place our duty on foreign wine at such a point as would materially increase our relations with our continental neighbours. That is a consummation much to be desired. I cannot, however, say at present that it appears to me we can look forward to its immediate occurrence with any very sanguine hopes, but in the meantime we have this consolation in reviewing our fiscal system, that, however the large amount of our expenditure may render it necessary to maintain rates of duty upon some articles of domestic production, and on some articles which we import that are inconveniently high, and which we would be glad to reduce, yet, nevertheless, our fiscal system is now framed upon equitable principles. It favours no one class of the community at the expense of another class—it favours no one foreign nation at the expense of another foreign nation—it favours no class of importers at the expense of another class of importers—it is equal to all, whether foreigners or natives, and whenever it may happen that a great increase in our wealth and consumption, and a possible reduction of expenditure, may enable us to reduce the rates of some of those duties, we may then have an opportunity of holding out to the taxpayers a prospect which, under the present circumstances of the country, I fear it would be an illusion for us to expect within any period likely soon to occur. After these explanations, I trust the hon. Gentleman will not think it necessary to divide the House upon this occasion.

MR. PELLATT said, he wished to inform the House that the manufacturing interest of the Potteries warmly sympathised with this Motion; they felt that a large portion of their trade was at stake in it, and were anxious that something should be done in order to extend their connections with France. On the other hand, he must confess that the people of France viewed our free-trade principles with suspicion; they could not believe us sincere while we kept up these heavy duties on their light wines, which we professed so much to want. He hoped the time was not far distant when the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer would be able to hold out brighter hopes than he had done on the present occasion.

MR. P. O'BRIEN said, he thought that they ought to look to home and reduce the malt duty, if they reduced duties in favour of the merchants of France, Spain, and Portugal. The object of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Oliveira) was no doubt a legitimate one, but if the duties on wine were reduced, taxes must be laid on the people in another shape, to make up the deficiencies in the revenue. He thought that all that was said about strengthening the "bonds of alliance" with foreign countries was only fine talk. Let foreign merchants meet the English half way, and then they might talk of universal free trade. Some of those cheap wines of which so much had been said, were very sour wines, and he thought that the people of this country would prefer drinking the pale ale manufactured by a Member of that House to drinking those foreign wines, for which they had not yet cultivated a taste. In the absence of any popular agitation upon the subject, he thought it was premature to call upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer to sacrifice so large an amount of revenue as an alteration of the wine duties would entail.

MR. BRAMLEY-MOORE: * Sir, I entirely concur in the observations which have fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, on the financial part of this question, and will not go over the same ground. I should not, Sir, have offered myself to the notice of the House, but for the remarks made by the hon. Member for Southwark (Mr. A. Pellatt), and my hon. Friend below me (Mr. Oliveira), which render it necessary for some one to point out the disadvantages which this country labours under in its commercial relations with France, Spain, and Portugal.

My hon. Friend has given the House an elaborate statement of the progress of the wine trade from an early period, and endeavoured to show that the consumption has increased when reductions of duty had been effected. Now, it is a very remarkable fact that there has been little variation in the consumption of wine, and that it has not been affected by the reduction of duties. When Mr. Huskisson reduced the duty in 1825, there was no increase of consumption, and it has continued with little variation from that time to the present day; and if you will take into the calculation the increase of our population, the consumption of wine has actually diminished. The following is the official return of wine retained for consumption:—

1825	8,009,542	£1,815,068
1830	6,434,445	1,351,607
1831 Duty reduced to	6,212,264	1,356,208
1835 5s. 6d.	6,420,342	1,691,532
1840 Duty 5s. 3d.	6,553,992	1,872,799
1845 "	6,736,131	1,787,560
1850 "	6,437,222	1,824,457
1855 "	6,296,439	Duty not ret.

Wine is consumed by the rich, and those who can well afford to pay for it; it is therefore to my mind a proper article for taxation. And before we meddle with the duty on wine, we must do an act of justice to the labouring classes and mechanics at home, by reducing the duty on malt, which affects the price of those really national beverages which are used by all in the shape of beer and porter.

The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer stated the duty on malt to be only £5,690,000; but, Sir, I beg to remind the hon. Gentleman the duty paid on malt for the past year (according to a Return lately made to this House), was £6,767,000. [Here the CHANCELLOR rose and intimated that he quoted the duty for 1853.] I beg the right hon. Gentleman's pardon; I understood him to quote the duty for the year past; however, I give the latest return for the past year, when it amounted to the sum I have named, £6,767,000. This sum exceeds the duty on wine more than threefold; and malt is consumed mainly by the poorer classes. I submit it has stronger claims than wine on the sympathy of this House for reduction. The consumption of malt, owing to the increased duties, is less than it was fifteen years ago.

	Bushels.	Rate of Duty.	Amount of Duty.
1841	30,164,448	2s. 7d. and	£4,889,252
1845	36,545,900	5 per cent.	4,937,959
1846	42,097,085	"	5,891,142
1850	40,744,752	"	5,511,441
1854	36,819,360	4s.	6,042,888
1855	33,887,564	"	6,767,076

I now come, Sir, to our commercial relations, and will begin with France. France has no claim upon us for further concessions in the way of reduction of duties, and it is a delusion to suppose we can extend our commerce by reducing the duty on wine, or thereby induce, as my hon. Friend would lead you to suppose, France to relax her fiscal system, and adopt a more liberal commercial policy. It is England who ought to ask this of France, that she should give something in return by way of reciprocity for the advantages we have conceded. We have thrown open the whole of our trade to France; she can trade to all our Colonies on the same footing as we do ourselves; she can compete with us in our colonial markets on equal terms; and she can bring produce from our Colonies or any part of the world to England on the same footing as we can do. I ask, can we do the same to France? If I, as a British merchant, wish to import sugar or coffee into France from South America, Ceylon, or any other country under the British flag, I am subjected to differential duties, and so prohibitory in their operation as to exclude British shipping. In addition to a large differential tonnage duty on the ship, there is on the cargo in British bottoms a difference varying from 15 to more than 100 per cent. Thus I, as British shipowner, am excluded from the valuable carrying trade of Lagaira, St. Domingo, Costa Rica, and even our own Colonies, into France.

In answer to the hon. Member for Southwark (Mr. A. Pellatt), that if we reduce the duty on French wine, we might induce France to receive our pottery and cutlery on more favourable terms, I beg of the House not to be deluded by any such arguments. We admit into England all French manufactures, at merely nominal duties, and her trade with England has increased since 1843, from £2,500,000 to £10,500,000, and nearly all in a highly manufactured state; while, on the other hand, our exports to France remain almost stationary, being now only about 3,000,000, and consisting mainly of coal, unwrought copper, China clay, wool, and other articles, on which very little skilled labour has been employed.

I submit, it is for France to make concessions, and meet us in a spirit of reciprocity; her people want our pottery, cutlery, and cottons; and at reasonable duties—we should have a large accession to our trade, and the advantages be mutual.

I now come briefly to notice our relations with Spain. Spanish ships enjoy all the advantages of the British flag, both with regard to imports and exports to England, our Colonies, and all parts of the world, but Spain concedes nothing in return. You will find a British ship loading side by side with a Spanish ship for Spain, Cuba, or Manilla; the Spanish ship obtains 60*s.* to 70*s.* freight per ton, and the British ship only 25*s.* to 30*s.* per ton, owing to the differential duties levied on the cargoes at the port of discharge. I ask, is this right, that while we place Spanish vessels, in all respects, on the same footing as British ships, that I, as a British shipowner, should be compelled to accept a freight so much lower than the Spaniard, in our own docks? Here, I say, we should ask for more liberality from Spain, before we make further and uncalled-for concessions.

With regard to Portugal, we are her best customers; and notwithstanding that we place Portuguese ships and produce on an equality with British ships from our Colonies and all parts of the world, yet she imposes (according to the evidence before the Select Committee of this House) a duty of £6 per pipe on wine exported to England, and only 6*d.* per pipe to the United States, thus making the export duty to England 240 times more than to the United States. My hon. Friend says, this has been lately reduced; I give it as I find it in Mr. Forester's evidence before the Wine Committee, page 14.

The average exports from Portugal, for nine years, amount to 33,337 pipes of wine; of these 22,861 come to Great Britain; 1,917 to the continent of Europe; and 8,559 to the rest of the world. Thus Great Britain takes two-thirds of the entire exports of wine from Portugal, or twelve times more than the continent of Europe.

I therefore submit, before we make further reductions on wine, we ought to require some relaxation in favour of the high fiscal duties on our manufactures, going to Portugal. The effect of lowering this duty would be to raise the price in Portugal and increase adulteration, the production not being equal to the demand in its pure state. I repudiate protection in ships and manufactures, and ask for free trade and reciprocity. British energy and industry will do the rest.

The hon. Gentleman urges upon the consideration of the House the moral advantages which will result; and how it would improve the condition of the labouring classes, if the duty were reduced to 1*s.*, and the lower descriptions of wine thereby brought into general consumption. This could only be done at the sacrifice of the malt duty. But the evidence runs quite in a contrary direction, and witnesses of the highest respectability give it as their opinion, that the working classes would not drink the low-class wines, and that they would prefer beer. With the permission of the House, I will read one or two extracts from the evidence. Mr. Maxwell, upwards of twenty years in business, says at page 446, vol. i. :—

“ I place the large class of tradesmen with the bankers and merchants, and gentlemen of private fortunes. The next would be the respectable shopkeepers. It is a great mistake to suppose that they do not take wine; they take a considerable quantity of wine now. There might be a small increased consumption then, at a lower duty, but not very great. Then the next class will be the lowest class, the million if I may so express it; and I can safely give an opinion, after some little experience and consideration of the subject, that I do not believe that they would drink the class of wines you could sell them at a very low price; and they would be exceedingly foolish if they did, to take it in preference to good beer. I can mention one or two facts, which have often struck me in my own business. We have a number of people coming into our counting-house in the day, of the lower class of carmen, and that class of men. It is almost universal for them to ask for something to drink. If you offer them a glass of wine, I have known them refuse it; they have often said to me, ‘Give me threepence to buy a pot of beer, and I would be much obliged to you.’ Then again, I have actually heard it stated, I will not vouch for it being the fact, but I believe it is the case, we are very liable to pillage, and our men will take the wine; but if you put beer in the cellar, they will take the beer in preference to the wine.

Mr. Bramley-Moore

though they may take the finest wine in the cellar; that is the positive fact. And if you come to this class of wine—I have not attended this examination much, and do not know the views the gentlemen moving in the matter take—but if you come to introduce this class of wine, it would turn out a complete failure; and at the very low duty they propose, I believe the revenue would suffer greatly."

He says there is a diminished consumption of wine in the navy. Mr. Hart, page 427, says—

"His house has been established a century. He does not think the labouring classes would consume low-class wines duty free; always found men prefer a glass of beer; has seen it in hundreds of instances; they prefer ale or porter; there is more nature in it; foreigners prefer it to their low wines; they drink low wines in their own country, because they can get nothing better."

Mr. Bushell, page 753, says—"Low-class wines would not be consumed at any duty; labouring men prefer beer."

I might quote many other instances, but will not trespass on the patience of the House.

I think I have shown that low-class wines would meet with no favour in this country; and if the duty were reduced to 1s., it would be the means of introducing brandy at this rate, partly under the guise of wines, and the increased quantity which would be used in the bonded vaults, to strengthen the poor wines to make them keep. But, Sir, I will prove to the House, from the evidence of the hon. Gentleman who makes this Motion, that wines may be imported at a very moderate cost. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Oliveira) tells the Committee, at page 254, vol. i.—

"I am myself in the habit of importing for my own private use and that of some friends, who like those wines, considerable quantities, and I find that the cost price is about 20s. a dozen, with the present duty. In consequence of some correspondence with my cousin, the late Count Tojal, an arrangement was made, by which I imported them at £5 5s. per case of three dozens, which returned a very large profit, nearly 50 per cent."

[Mr. OLIVEIRA: That is quite correct.] Very well, if the hon. Gentleman will content himself with more moderate profits than 50 per cent, and be satisfied with a remuneration of something like 8 or 10 per cent, he may, if he please, introduce wine at a very reasonable price for general consumption.

I will not trespass further on the time of the House, and beg to thank the House for its indulgence, and the patient hearing which has been given me.

MR. OLIVEIRA, in reply, said that, after what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he should not press his Motion to a division.

REFORMATORIES FOR PENITENT FEMALES.

MR. BIGGS said, he rose to move—

"That this House will resolve itself into a Committee to consider the propriety of granting sums in aid of any reformatories for penitent females at present existing, or that may hereafter be established."

The question in connection with which he begged to submit the present Motion to the House was one of great importance, and of which he could not but express his regret that it had not been brought before Parliament at an earlier period. In order to entitle his Motion to some chance of success he had taken the trouble of making inquiries of the various reformatories throughout the kingdom, and he found that those institutions were altogether supported by the munificent donations of private individuals, but he was sorry to add that the funds thus raised were utterly inadequate to the requirements of the class for whose benefit they were destined. He thought it was the duty of a Christian Legislature to come forward under such circumstances, and to meet so great a social want. Institutions and hospitals for the reception of the sufferers from almost every form of human infirmity were well and fairly supported, but he feared that the very nature of the establishments to which he desired to call attention prevented the pure and virtuous from taking any active share in their support. From the very peculiar nature of the subject the generality of people appeared afraid to enter into it. It was an ascertained fact that in this metropolis alone there were 20,000 unfortunate women, whose lives were a cause of disease and demoralisation to others, a curse to themselves, and a pest to society; and the number in provincial towns was, no doubt, equally large in proportion. Thousands of those unfortunate creatures, he found, made unavailing application for admission to reformatories, which were unable to receive them on account of the want of funds, and they thus were forced to the alternative of continuing a course of life which they had endeavoured to abandon. Could the expenditure of a few thousands on the part of the Legislature be questioned when it was known that for the want of it those outcasts of society were yearly dying by thousands, ignored, unnoticed, and unknown? It was a fact established by hospital returns, and confirmed by the experience of medical men, that the average duration of life amongst the unfortunate class to which he referred was from five to seven years. Assuming it to be seven years, they would have a mortality in London alone amounting to 3,000 per annum, and throughout the country to something like 20,000 or 30,000. In London there were but eighteen reformatories; in the provinces, about twenty—a number, even supposing them to be well supported—a supposition which was at variance with facts—utterly inadequate to the numbers he had quoted. During the year 1855, no less than 2,598 applications for admission into the institutions of London had been refused on account of want of funds. Such a state of things was frightful to contemplate, and ought, if possible, to be put an end to. There was one institution in London, the London Society, for the protection of women, in which the girls were under fifteen years of age, and which, under the name of a school, received a grant from the State, and why should not women of a more advanced age receive similar assistance to enable them to return to the paths of virtue? To prove that the general opinion entertained as to the utter depravity of these unfortunate women was an erroneous one, he might mention that in the existing institutions a considerable amount of the expenses connected with them was defrayed by the labour of the inmates; and it was his intention, if the House agreed to his Motion, to move a Resolution the effect of which would be that reformatory institutions already in existence, or which might hereafter be established, should have a right to claim from the State for their support a sum equal to that which was raised by voluntary efforts. If, at that late period of the Session, he did not succeed in carrying his Motion he would, at least, have the satisfaction of knowing that he was the first to moot a question which must recommend itself to the benevolence of all. He could only say that he intended to bring the subject before the House again and again, until he succeeded in making a favourable impression.

MR. SPEAKER said, that the Motion must come with a recommendation from the Crown. It was therefore out of order, and could not be proceeded with.

Mr. Biggs

GENERAL BEATSON.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he rose to move for a copy of the correspondence between the Minister at War and General Beatson, as to certain charges preferred against that officer. The question connected with this correspondence involved the conduct of a general officer who had served for thirty-five years in the British service, who had gained the gold medal, and had six times received the thanks of his country for his distinguished services in the field. The facts connected with the case were as follows:—Last year the Government had deemed it necessary to raise a corps of Turkish troops, and selected to command them an officer who was well acquainted with Asiatic customs. General Beatson was the officer who had attained this high distinction. The corps of Bashi Bazonks, known as Beatson's Horse, were ultimately placed under the command of General Vivian. General Beatson was recalled, and when he left the country there were accusations made against his conduct after he had received orders to deliver up the troops to General Vivian, which, if true, subjected him to the punishment of death. On the 5th of March, General Vivian wrote to Lord Panmure referring to those charges. The first was that he had endeavoured to excite mutiny amongst the officers and men under his command; the second was, that he had sent out a "round robin" amongst the men, with a view of obliging the Government to re-appoint him to the command. General Vivian thought it his duty to forward those charges to the Government, with a view, not only to the good of the service, but also in justice to General Beatson himself. The Government directed a Court of Inquiry to assemble at Schumla to investigate those charges, and that Court of Inquiry took place altogether unknown to General Beatson. Now, he (Colonel Dunne) must complain that that was a course which had never before been followed in the British service. On the 5th of March this inquiry was entered upon, and on the 6th of April the Court sent forward its Report. General Beatson, up to that time, knew nothing whatever of the charges that had been made against him. It was not until the 17th of May that, at General Vivian's suggestion, a copy of the charges was sent to him. Now, it was the fact of this secrecy of which he (Colonel Dunne) complained. Nothing, however, resulted from this Court of Inquiry, and General Beatson did not to this hour know whether he was considered guilty, or was absolved from these charges. Now, he would ask, was that fair, either to himself, or to the profession to which he belonged? He (Colonel Dunne) supposed that the Government considered that the charges were absurd, because, if they had believed them to have the slightest colour, they ought to have brought General Beatson to trial before a court-martial. They had, however, done nothing; they had only refused to give to General Beatson a fair acquittal, and to acknowledge that they were in error. He should therefore move that the whole of the correspondence should be laid upon the table and given to the public. General Beatson was ready to meet the charges. He had over and over again written to the noble Lord at the head of the War Department, but could get no satisfaction. The first charge was that General Beatson had incited two colonels to mutiny. General Beatson had written to both these officers, and from their letters it appeared that there was no foundation for that charge. If General Beatson was guilty of the charges brought against him, the papers ought to be laid on the table that he might receive the condemnation which he would deserve. If, on the other hand, he was innocent, a brave and distinguished officer ought not to be kept in ignorance of who were his accusers, but should have the fullest opportunity of clearing himself from the false and malicious accusations brought against him. He therefore demanded, as a simple act of justice to General Beatson, that this extraordinary correspondence should be at once produced, and the whole case against him placed before the world.

Motion made, and Question proposed—

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, that She will be graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid before this House, a Copy of the Correspondence between the Minister at War and General Beatson, lately employed as Commander of a Turkish Contingent, as to certain charges preferred against that Officer.”

MR. FREDERICK PEEL said, that the hon. and gallant Member had correctly stated the nature of the employment which had been given by the Government to General Beatson. That officer was instructed to raise a body of irregular cavalry in Asia Minor, Syria, Bulgaria, and Albania, and to take the command of the men when raised. That force first came under the command of General Beatson in the month of June; but in the September following it was deemed expedient that it should form part of the Turkish Contingent under General Vivian, and that another body of irregular cavalry should be placed under General Beatson. The charges brought against General Beatson were connected with this transfer of his command to the officer who succeeded him. They were to this effect—that he had instigated some of the commanding officers of the regiments under him to decline to serve under any other officer than himself, and had sought to induce the natives of the force to prefer remaining under his command rather than that of any other person. These accusations were sent anonymously to General Vivian, who forwarded them to Her Majesty's Government, who felt it their duty to direct an inquiry into the matter, with a view, if possible, of verifying the statements made. General Smith, at Schumla, who was with General Beatson on the occasion, was instructed to set that inquiry afloat. That inquiry did take place, and the statements of the commanding officers were forwarded to the War Department. That inquiry, however, might still be considered pending, inasmuch as the correspondence connected with it had not as yet closed. The result, however, of this inquiry, as far as it had gone, did not justify the Government in taking any proceedings against General Beatson. The course taken by the War Department was the obvious and usual course, in instituting an inquiry with a view merely of ascertaining whether there were prima facie any grounds for taking proceedings against General Beatson. From what had taken place he apprehended there would be no further proceedings in the matter. As, however, the correspondence had not as yet closed, he could not assent to the Motion of the hon. and gallant Gentleman.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he wished to ask whether it was usual to hold a secret Court of Inquiry upon a British officer in respect to charges contained in an anonymous communication? Would the hon. Gentleman tell him what was the report of this Court of Inquiry? He (Colonel Dunne) would venture to say that such a proceeding could not take place in the most absolute army on the Continent—even in the Russian army. Having served in the British army since he was a boy, he certainly never thought that such an occurrence could take place. He considered that the Government should have sent to General Beatson at once, not only the nature of the charges that were to be brought against him, but the Report of the Court when they had received it. General Beatson had applied frequently to the War Department on the subject, but could get no redress from it. The country, he believed, would be thoroughly disgusted with the conduct of the War Department in the matter.

Motion put and negatived.

CURSITOR BARON OF THE EXCHEQUER BILL.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he begged to move for leave to bring in a Bill to abolish the office of Cursitor Baron of the Exchequer, vacant by the decease of the right hon. George Bankes. The duties of the office were of a merely formal nature, and a small salary was attached to their performance.

Leave given.

Bill ordered to be brought in by the Chancellor of the Exchequer and Viscount Palmerston.

CONSOLIDATED FUND (APPROPRIATION) BILL.

Order for Third Reading read.

Bill read 3^o.

SIR GEORGE PECHELL said, he wished to ask whether the correspondence with foreign Governments relating to the slave trade, in continuation of former correspondence on the same subject, would be laid upon the table? The services in which the navy had recently been engaged in the Black Sea and the Baltic had naturally diverted attention from the measures adopted by Her Majesty's Government for repressing the slave trade on the coasts of Cuba, Brazil, and Africa. He would take that opportunity, however, to express his acknowledgments to the noble Lord at the head of the Government for the exertions he had made to obtain valuable treaties on this subject, and also for having carried those treaties into effect by maintaining an efficient naval force on the coasts of Africa and Brazil. Strong hopes had been entertained, after the engagements entered into by Spain for the repression of the slave trade, that those engagements would be faithfully fulfilled; but it had been shown before the Committee that had been moved for by the late Mr. Hume, that, notwithstanding the promises of the Spanish Government and of the Captain General of Cuba, slavers were actually fitted out under the guns of the Spanish ships of war at the Havannah. It was notorious, also, that the Government of Brazil had favoured the introduction of slaves into that country. The British cruisers on the coast of Cuba were entirely unsuited to the service on which they were employed, and they ought to be replaced by vessels of much lighter draught of water. He would therefore beg to suggest to the First Lord of the Admiralty that some of the new gunboats, which were peculiarly adapted for that service, should be stationed at Nassau, in the Bahamas, and they would be well able to follow slavers into the shallow waters of the adjacent seas.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he was sure the House was aware that nobody had shown more zeal for the suppression of the slave trade than his hon. and gallant Friend who had just addressed them, and he felt certain that his hon. and gallant Friend must feel a just and commendable pride in the reflection that such eminent success had attended the exertions in which he had taken part. He thought the slave trade might be regarded as extinct in Brazil, for though attempts had been made to revive it, those attempts had not been attended with much success. He thought we might depend upon the Government of Brazil to enforce those laws which had been enacted for the suppression of that trade. Those who formerly invested their money in this traffic now employed it for purposes of internal improvement, and there was generally evinced throughout that country a spirit of hostility to the revival of the trade. There had, however, been a great mortality among the slave population, and speculators from the United States had endeavoured to take advantage of the circumstance by importing negroes, but he believed that very little success had attended their efforts. With regard to Cuba, he was sorry to say that the Spanish Government, though profuse in their assurances and liberal in their orders, had not always been so active in carrying those orders into effect as might be desired. The Captains General who went there usually did very well for the first year or two, but their virtue soon yielded to the temptations to which they were exposed, and their vigilance relaxed so far as to give the slave dealers considerable advantage. During the late war the Admiralty had withdrawn from the station certain vessels employed in the suppression of the slave trade; but there were now in the navy vessels well calculated for that service; and he could assure his hon. and gallant Friend that the First Lord of the Admiralty was anxious to employ such as would be best adapted for watching the coast of Cuba. He was afraid that we must rely more on our own vigilance than on the orders issued by Spain. Though a few cargoes might now and then be landed in Cuba, he did not think the numbers bore any proportion to what was formerly imported into that country; and he would only say, in conclusion, that if we succeeded in thoroughly putting down that horrid traffic, it would be one of the proudest triumphs ever achieved by any country.

Bill passed.

INCOME AND LAND TAXES BILL.

House in Committee.

Clause 1 agreed to.

Clause 2.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he had received representations from some of the clerks to the Commissioners of the Income-tax, complaining that by this clause their salaries would be reduced in amount. He found, on examination, that the complaint was just, and therefore he was prepared to make some concession. He proposed that a poundage of 2*d.* should be paid till the salary amounted to £500 a year, and that after that sum the poundage should be 1*d.* That, he thought, would be satisfactory to the class of persons interested.

MR. T. CHAMBERS said, he would suggest that the reduction should be prospective from the 5th of April next. He was glad to hear that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had modified his Bill in this respect, as it would have been most unjust to restrict the poundage to £800 in all cases.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, the only fault he had to find with the Chancellor of the Exchequer was that he had not made a larger reduction. It was shown by a recent return that one of the income-tax collectors received a salary of £6,600 a year, in addition to the profits of other occupations in which he was engaged. Many of his brother officials did not receive more than £60 or £70 for performing the same duties. The best plan would be to limit the salaries to a certain amount, all the percentage above that amount to go into the Exchequer.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the performance of the duties of these officers for the present year had not yet commenced, and therefore it was competent to the House, without violating any contract, to revise their salaries. He thought that, by the operation of the increased income tax, the salaries of the present clerks of the Commissioners were in some cases extensive; but he only proposed to deal with the salaries of thirty out of 700 clerks. The salary of the City of London clerk was stated in the return at £6,614 a year. That was the amount of the salary which he received before the most recent addition to the income tax, and probably the same official would now be in the receipt of upwards of £7,000 per annum. His outgoings could not be more than £1,000, and therefore, according to the present percentage, his net income would be about £6,000, or more than the salary of the First Lord of the Treasury, the Secretaries of State, or the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who was at the head of the Department. The House would see that, if they were to preserve a due gradation in the salaries of the Revenue Department, the remuneration of Mr. Till was unreasonably high. Again, the collector in Liverpool received a salary of £3,215, and the collector in Manchester a salary of upwards of £3,000. No one could think the proposed reduction unreasonable. It would still leave the collector in the City of London a sum of between £3,000 and £4,000 a year, and some of the other collectors a salary as large as that of the great officers of State.

MR. HENLEY said, he wished to have an explanation of the previous clause, which seemed simply to repeal a provision in an existing Act that discharged lands from the land tax after the redemption money was paid.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the provision which it was proposed to repeal limited the power of redemption to persons who had estates in fee. A former Act allowed persons having limited interest to redeem under certain restrictions, and what he proposed was to remit the law to its ancient state.

MR. HENLEY said, he very much doubted whether the Act referred to was of the nature which the Chancellor of the Exchequer supposed, he still apprehended that the effect of the clause in the present Bill would be such as he had already stated.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that if the Committee would allow the clause to pass now, he would ascertain whether there was any mistake, and state the result upon some future occasion.

Clause agreed to, as were the remaining clauses.

House resumed.

Bill reported.

STAMP DUTIES BILL.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

Clause 1.

Mr. VANCE said, that by the present Bill the stamp duty on the proxies of the shareholders of a company was reduced from 2s. 6d. to 6d. At the meetings of large railway companies there was great abuse in the system of voting by proxy, and he did not think that the proposed reduction would abate the evil. He wished to propose as an Amendment that the duty should be reduced to 1d., and, if that proposition were carried, the shareholders might make it compulsory on the directors to send a stamped form of proxy to every shareholder, and thus nearly every proprietor might be represented at the meetings.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the reduction of duty effected by the Bill would be considerable. If shareholders would not be inclined to pay 6d. stamp duty for a proxy, they could not attach very much importance to their vote when great pecuniary interests were concerned. It had been represented to him by several persons connected with railroads, that the reduction of duty to the amount stated in the Bill would be satisfactory, and he trusted that the Committee would approve it.

MR. JAMES MACGREGOR said he would beg to remind the right hon. Gentleman that there was a Return before the House, which showed that the capital embarked in railways amounted to over £300,000,000 sterling. while the number of proprietors was 167,000. Well, of that number it would appear that four-fifths were non-resident, and of that proportion only one-twentieth sent in proxies. The proposed reduction in the stamp was, no doubt, very considerable; nevertheless, the tax was still too high. Take the case of a great company like the London and North-Western, with 12,000 proprietors. Why, the sum levied by means of the proxy votes on the occasion of an important meeting would amount to a very heavy item. He believed, if the tax were reduced to 1d., then it would become the policy of railway directors to issue proxies to all non-resident shareholders.

MR. HANKEY said, he thought no further reduction was required than was proposed by the Bill.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to; as were the remaining clauses.

On the Motion of the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER a new clause was added to the Bill, exempting from the duty admissions to the freedom of the City of London by redemption.

In reply to Mr. COWAN,

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he could not hold out any hope that the benefit of the reduction would be extended to instruments by which creditors empowered a few of their number to represent them at meetings, as that class of instruments had an affinity with powers of attorney rather than with proxies.

House resumed.

Bill reported, as amended.

COURT OF APPEAL IN CHANCERY (IRELAND) BILL.

Order for Third Reading read.

Bill read 3^o.

MR. WHITESIDE said, he would beg to advise the Government not to fill up vacancies in offices in Ireland which were intended to be immediately abolished. The practice prevailed, and the consequence was that healthy men became burdens for life on the funds of the country to the extent of their salaries. One gentleman thus happily circumstanced had said that he was indebted to his friends the Whigs for giving him £1,000 a year for reading the newspapers in his office, and he was indebted to his friends the Tories for giving him another £1,000 a year to read the newspapers at home. He hoped any vacancy which might occur in the five Masterships in Chancery or in the two Commissionerships in Bankruptcy would not be filled up.

Bill passed.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a Third Time."

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, he wished to give notice that he should move in Committee to insert in this Bill the clause which was inserted in that House in a similar Bill on a former occasion, the effect of which would be to prevent the owner of Hampstead Heath from building on that property.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD said, he objected to the Bill in toto, considering it highly improper that the Court of Chancery should have the power of authorising a person to act in direct contravention of the wills of settlers. He wished to call attention to the fact that the Bill, although it had been on the books for some weeks, was only attempted to be got through just at the fag-end of the Session, when hon. Members were not in their places. He should, therefore, move that the Bill be read a second time that day three months.

LORD ROBERT GROSVENOR said, he was not prepared to oppose the second reading of the Bill, which he thought was a good one in its general principles. Should, however, the clause referred to by the hon. Member for Westminster (Sir J. Shelley) be not agreed to, he should oppose the further progress of the Bill.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, he hoped that the general benefit which the Bill would accomplish, would not be lost on account of the special objection to the possible enclosure of Hampstead Heath. A clause, to which he had assented, had been introduced into a similar Bill last Session, which had been intended as a protection against an invasion of public rights. At the same time he was not a person to consent to the introduction of a clause directed entirely against an individual, concerning whose particular intentions he believed a great mistake existed. The Bill was intended to relieve persons interested in settled estates from the necessity of coming to Parliament for powers which, however consistent with the interests of all parties concerned, had been omitted from the settlement. If the House would consent to the second reading of the Bill he would make it an early order on Friday, when there would be ample opportunity of discussing the details.

MR. MALINS said, he should give the Bill his entire support, but he would not consent to a public Bill restricting private rights. If, therefore, the clause in question was inserted he should give the measure his most strenuous opposition.

MR. WHITESIDE said, that from a mere love of legal right, he should certainly oppose the introduction of the clause proposed by the hon. Member for Westminster, because it was against every principle of justice that they should interfere with the rights of a private individual on the mere assumption that he intended to interfere with Hampstead Heath.

MR. HENLEY said, his hon. and learned Friends behind him had denounced with much virtuous indignation a general clause which they said would affect a particular individual. Now, he should like those hon. and learned Gentlemen to tell him whether this general Bill would not also affect that individual, and if so, why did they support it? For himself, he must confess that he did not like this Bill at all. It was nothing more than making wills for men, and giving to persons rights regarding property which those who made the wills never contemplated conferring. If his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. S. Fitzgerald) divided the House he should certainly vote with him.

FORMATION OF PARISHES BILL.

Order of the Day for the second reading read.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY, in moving the second reading of the Bill, said, that its object was to amend and enlarge an Act passed some years ago, called Peel's Act, whereby populous districts might be formed into parishes. There was a body called the Church Building Commission, which had been appointed for the purpose of portioning out such districts and building churches therein, and that Commission having expired, the present Bill had been introduced for the purpose of transferring its powers to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, of enabling those Commissioners to build churches, and of assigning to them various rights and jurisdictions which they had not hitherto been entitled to exercise. At present, the greater part of the services of baptism, marriage, and burial took place in the mother church of the parish, and in populous districts great confusion and disorder were thereby caused in the sacred edifice, while much dissatisfaction was felt on the part of those who were obliged to travel a long distance to take part in the marriages and burials. In the collegiate church of Manchester, as many as sixty marriages had sometimes taken place on a Sunday; while in St. Pancras, London, there were sometimes between thirty and forty. It was important to the Church of England that there should be an easy access to all its services, and that there should be a multiplication of districts enjoying the full power of performing all the services of the Church. The Bill now before their Lordships would, it was hoped, contribute to induce people to come forward and multiply these districts.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2^a.

THE BISHOP OF OXFORD said, he had much pleasure in supporting a Bill which would enable the Church to develop itself according to the spiritual needs of the population, and should rejoice to see the Bill become law.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, he was disposed to give his assent to the second reading of the Bill, but, since there were many details in it which required great consideration, that it was desirable that it should be referred to a Select Committee where they could be examined. He did not wish to interpose any delay, but the measure was not one that ought to be passed hastily.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY said, he had no objection that the Bill should be referred to a Select Committee; but, at this late period of the Session, there was some danger in adopting the suggestion of the noble Earl. The measure was one of vital importance, and he was authorised to say that it had the entire sanction of the Lord Primate. He trusted that if the Bill were referred to a Select Committee, they would meet to-morrow, so that no time should be lost.

LORD REDESDALE thought that the appointment of a Select Committee need not delay the passing of the measure in the present Session.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read 2^a accordingly, and referred to a Select Committee.

BISHOPS OF LONDON AND DURHAM RETIREMENT BILL.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into a Committee read.

Moved, That the House do now resolve itself into a Committee.

LORD REDESDALE: I submit to your Lordships whether, before going into Committee, you ought not to have the correspondence between the Bishops of London and Durham and the Government, relating to their retirement, and which has been moved for by a right rev. Prelate (the Bishop of Oxford), laid upon the table of the House. The preamble to this Bill states that these right rev. Prelates have represented to Her Majesty's Government their inability to perform their duties, and their desire on that account to vacate their sees. We know nothing—except from the representations of Her Majesty's Government—of the terms upon which that representation has been made. We do not know whether the conditions are such that the Bill cannot be amended without breaking them. We do not know whether consent was given by these right rev. Prelates upon the understanding that there would be a general Bill, or upon the understanding that there would be a measure personal to themselves only, because I must repeat what I said on a former occasion, that upon the latter supposition, this measure is a mode of carrying out a simoniacal contract, and I cannot believe that the right rev. Prelates could, however incautiously, come to agree to a proposition that a separate treaty should be made with them. They may have said that if a general measure were passed, they would willingly avail themselves of it; but I can hardly believe it possible that they would consent to treat in a manner which, if a rector so treated with his patron, would lead to the charge of a simoniacal contract. Under these circumstances, I do think the House ought to have the correspondence to which this Bill relates, and I hope the Government will allow the Committee to be postponed till Monday.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: That the House is entitled to the correspondence in question no one can doubt, and there is not the slightest reluctance or hesitation in laying it upon the table; but I trust your Lordships will not make that very natural wish on the part of my right rev. Friend (the Bishop of Oxford) ground for not proceeding with this stage of the Bill. Notice having been given by my right rev. Friend that he would move for the correspondence, I immediately communicated with the First Lord of the Treasury, in whose hands the correspondence rests. Unfortunately, I have not got it yet, but no doubt it will be laid upon the table to-morrow. I can, however, assure your Lordships that the noble Lord is quite mistaken in supposing it relates to a general measure. It distinctly shows that these right rev. Prelates did not suppose they were doing anything simoniacal. The language of the Bishop of London was, if by law it could be done, he was anxious to do it, in consequence of the difficulties he found in discharging the duties of his office. With regard to the Bishop of Durham, I believe the letters also show that he considered the matter related specifically to himself.

THE BISHOP OF OXFORD: I hope your Lordships will well weigh this objection before you go into Committee. The going into Committee implies that you are about to consider the details of this measure, involving the amount of salaries and proposed pensions to these right rev. Prelates; and this your Lordships are about to do without any knowledge whatever, except on the statement of Her Majesty's Government, as to the previous stages of this arrangement. I am bound to say—and though I have no authority to say it, yet from my own knowledge of the circumstances I pledge my truth for it—that what has fallen from the noble and learned Lord on the woolsack does not give the true state of the case. Of course I do not, for a moment, impute to the noble and learned Lord the slightest intention to misrepresent; but, speaking from no slight acquaintance with the circumstances, that is what I believe to be the truth of the case. I believe the Bishop of London heard that Her Majesty's Government had been considering, by some general measure, the means of providing for the work of dioceses, the Bishops of which were worn out, and that within a few days a Bill would be laid upon the table of the House; and, being very anxious to help forward any such general measure, he did communicate to Her Majesty's Government, with a distinct view to that general measure, his readiness to retire. I believe, further, that it was stated to him that it might be found necessary, if not convenient, to deal with the case of the Bishops of London and Durham by a separate Bill; but that it would be a supplementary measure falling in with the general state of the law, as far as that general measure affected it. Mark, my Lords, the different position in which that would have placed my right rev. Friend (the Bishop of London). If a general law, affecting all who held spiritual charges, passed, and if an accompanying measure applied the general principle to any particular case, with the limitations which that particular case required, the right rev. Lord (the Bishop of London) would be altogether free in conscience and appearance from conniving at simony by merely consenting to bring their case under the then existing general law of the clergy. My right rev. Friend has not been acquainted with the objections on the ground of simony. I put it upon a hypothetical case. Suppose my right rev. Friend has not heard of this objection. Suppose that, not having it clearly before his mind, he assented because he expected this arrangement would be a proviso to a general act and altogether free from the general charge of simony. Suppose that in his present state of weakness he is unable to read the public journals, and his anxious friends who are watching round him do not dare to tell him this objection to a private Bill—I will suppose there was no positive stipulation that there should be a general measure. Then, I ask, if such a hypothetical case should turn out to be the truth, are you prepared to proceed, and, taking advantage of an offer under very different supposed circumstances, to make the right rev. Lord guilty in the eyes of the great body of the Church of England of a simoniacal transaction, for his own convenience, when my right rev. Friend is altogether free from any charge of the kind, and it is only from the mode in which he has been treated that he is exposed to it? A great deal was said the other night of the feelings of my right rev. Friend, and how much was due to him, and the noble Earl said, in almost a pathetic way, would the House refuse the petition of the right rev. Prelate to be released in his old age from duties which he found himself unable to perform? I believe that is an entire perversion of the state of the case; that my right rev. Friend made the offer with a view to helping forward a general Act; and that, so far from promoting his wishes by carrying this Bill, your Lordships would promote them most abundantly by refusing in this way to give these particular privileges; because the more attention I give to it the more I come to the conclusion (and a frightful conclusion it is) that this is nothing more than an Act to exempt the Bishop of London from the pains and penalties of committing simony. I believe that is the real effect of the Bill you are passing, and I can only say, knowing the tender and sensitive conscientiousness of my right rev. Friend, that I tremble to think what the effect will be if, at a future time, on recovering some strength, he should find the way in which he has been treated, and that by the substitution of a particular for a general Act he has been made guilty of a scandal to the Church. I dare not estimate what the effect of such a discovery on his mind may be. I ask your Lordships whether you ought to do this—whether you ought not to require that the correspondence should first be in your hands? I think that is the least measure of justice to my right rev. Friend. I claim it of you as a matter of justice to him, that you should not take any representation of his words from a third party, and I say you ought further to do this—you ought to have an assurance that he knows this private Bill is being carried on, the public Bill being dropped. You ought not to take advantage of any letter he may have written in the simplicity and sincerity of his heart, and bind him down to that letter; but Her Majesty's Government ought to state distinctly that he knows it to be an act of simony that you are going to lead him to do. I ask upon what principle you are going? If an assent to a certain thing be obtained from a man, and afterwards the circumstances under which that assent was given are altogether changed, would not a Court of Chancery itself relieve a man who had so bound himself to a bargain under totally different circumstances? It is the plainest equity in the world, and I say your Lordships ought not to proceed with this Bill, based upon a resignation which I in my conscience believe was given by the right rev. Prelate under quite different circumstances from those which the passing of the Bill must produce. I at least pray your Lordships, at the present stage of this Bill, not to dream of going into Committee to settle the details until you know all the facts upon which the present measure is founded.

LORD CAMPBELL: I was, indeed, surprised when I heard my right rev. Friend (the Bishop of Oxford) accuse the Government of having introduced a Bill to legalise a simoniacal proceeding—accuse all your Lordships who had supported the measure now before the House of having voted for a Bill to carry out a simoniacal treaty—and, going further—and accuse five of his brother Prelates with having aided by their votes to ratify a simoniacal treaty. If any layman had stood up and made such a charge against Archbishops and Bishops of the Church—including the Primate of England and the Primate of Ireland—what would my right rev. Friend have done? Why, he would have instantly stood up in that House as the defender of his order, and have indignantly repudiated such a charge. And has it come to this—et tu Brute?—Do I hear my right rev. Friend stand up and charge five Members of the episcopacy with one of the most serious offences that could be attributed to any ecclesiastic? A more merciless attack was never made. I will tell my right rev. Friend that his charge is not founded in law or in fact. What is simony, and what does this Bill propose to do? Simony is a certain transaction which the law prohibits. One Act of Parliament can nullify a previous Act as perfectly as if the Act nullified had never been on the Statute-book; and I lay it down most solemnly for law, that an agreement to do this Act conditionally upon the sanction of the Legislature being given is not simony. The condition assented to by both the right rev. Prelates was this—they were content to do what certainly is now against the law of the land, but to do it with the consent of the Legislature. If the Legislature assent to this Act, it will pro tanto be the same as if the law had never prohibited it. It is not a private bargain. I should like to see a general law upon the subject. I do see great inconveniences in bargains toties quoties between retiring Bishops and the Government of the day ; but I say that, to call an arrangement which is publicly expressed to be conditional upon the consent of the Legislature being obtained, a simoniacal proceeding is a mere perversion of terms.

THE BISHOP OF OXFORD: My noble and learned Friend has completely misstated my words. I said if this privilegium did not pass, the compact which had been entered into, whether made publicly through the public journals, or privately by correspondence, will be simony by the law. I said also there were two ways in which the Act could be relieved from the crime of simony—one by altering the general law, and the other by passing a privilegium, a special Act of Parliament, to withhold in these instances the penalties which attach to similar acts done by other persons. What I say is this, if after you pass this Act any rector or vicar does, in the most open manner in the world, and with the most honourable motives in the world, the very same act which you allow the Bishop of London to do, then that rector or vicar will commit simony. Then, I say, this Bill is a privilegium to withdraw, in these instances, the penalties of simony from acts which under the general law will still remain illegal and simoniacal. I do not mean to say that legally the two right rev. Prelates would be guilty of simony if you pass this Bill, but the act they do will remain in other cases illegal.

LORD CAMPBELL: I say that if this Bill passes—though by a combination between my right rev. Friend and another party it may not pass—then there will be no simony either legal or moral in this matter.

THE EARL OF CHICHESTER explained the circumstances under which the resignation of the Bishop of London was communicated to him. He had been waited upon by the confidential friend and adviser of the Bishop, Mr. Hodgson, who informed him of the right rev. Prelate's desire, and begged of him to communicate it to the Ecclesiastical Commission. He (the Earl of Chichester) did so, and also immediately communicated it to the noble Lord at the head of the Government. He subsequently had several interviews with Mr. Hodgson and his partner, and took care to inform them, for the information of the Lord Bishop, of what was occurring in respect to the draughting of the Bill ; and, in order to save time, he (the Earl of Chichester) himself had a Bill prepared, not exactly similar to that now before the House, but the same in principle, in respect to its being a separate measure. A copy of that Bill was given to the Bishop's confidential adviser, and he was authorized to state that the Bishop saw that Bill, and generally approved it. Not a word was said by the Bishop against its being a separate measure, although, no doubt, he thought there should be a general measure, as every one else did.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY: My Lords, I wish to mention one matter, which appears to me to be well worthy of consideration, in reference to this subject—I mean the actual and prospective state of these great dioceses. I would ask of those who object to this Bill, in what way they intend to carry on the ecclesiastical government of this great town—how they intend during the interregnum to dispose of the patronage of the see ? in what way is the correspondence of the see to be carried on, or how are the clergy to be superintended, and generally how is the ecclesiastical government of this diocese to be administered ? The diocese of London stands in a peculiar position, different from all other dioceses, and in which it will not itself stand henceforward. It is one of the unregulated bishoprics, and the consequence is, that all the powers formerly exercised by Bishops are vested in the Bishop of London for the time being ; and I beg your Lordships to consider what those powers are. The Bishop has the administration of vast territorial revenues, amounting to no less than £22,000 per annum. He retains the powers formerly exercised by Bishops, of levying fines, of granting leases, and of disposing of the property of the Church ; he even has the power of anticipating and of making appropriations and assignments beneficial to the receiver, but prejudicial to the Church itself. The right rev. Prelate the Bishop of Exeter spoke the other night of the great convenience of entering upon an interregnum at the present moment, because the great pressure of business to which Bishops are exposed in holding confirmations and consecrations was over, as those ceremonies are not performed in the autumn and winter months. But are those the only duties which a Bishop has to perform ? If they be the only duties, shall we not hear very soon repeated that which has been so often said about Bishops—that they received large salaries and did nothing? If I find a great supporter of the episcopate—himself a Bishop—saying that during six months a Bishop has nothing to do, I believe he is establishing a stronger argument against the continuance of Bishops than anything which could be urged by the most violent anti-state-church partisan in the country. But is it nothing to have the spiritual charge of more than 2,000,000 people—of a population larger than that of many German duchies, and nearly as large as that of the kingdom of Sardinia? But I must rely on my authority alone. I will read an extract from a letter written by a rev. gentleman, an archdeacon, of great experience, who is far better able than I am to form an opinion as to the consequences which would ensue from the continuance of such an interregnum. It is necessary, I should first explain that it is intended, I believe, to put the diocese into the hands of Commissaries. Writing to me on this subject, my informant says—

“There can be no doubt that it is a great evil for this metropolitan diocese to be without an active head. Commissaries cannot have the same authority and influence; and the Commissaries of this diocese must henceforward labour under the additional disadvantage of exercising not merely a delegated authority, but an authority which, it is notorious, must soon expire. A new Bishop may reverse all their decisions. At the recent annual meeting of —, a rector expressed a general feeling when he stated that, in his arduous position, with a parish containing nearly 200,000 persons, he felt continually and most painfully the want of the full support of episcopal authority.”

This is a sentiment shared, I believe, by all the rectors and vicars of large parishes in the metropolis. But the Bishop of London has many other duties to perform besides consecration and confirmations. The writer of the letter I have quoted says—

“The Bishop of London exercises a customary jurisdiction over all chaplains in foreign parts, or in the colonies and the East Indies, where there is no Anglican Bishop. This is a jurisdiction of a very delicate nature, and of great importance to the credit of this country on the Continent; but having the sanction of the law, it is less easily delegated to a Commissary.”

It will be seen, therefore, that the Bishop of London stands in a very peculiar position. He cannot delegate his full powers to a Commissary, for he has many functions that do not attach to him by law, and which can be exercised only by himself and on his own responsibility. But we are also not without the benefit of experience on this question. There have heretofore been interregnums in various sees, and most mischievous consequences have ensued. I will not go into the details of some which took place many years ago; but there is one extremely notorious case of the kind to which I will refer, which occurred during the infirmity of the Bishop of Bath and Wells. Hear what is said of this case by a person who knew well what the facts were:—

“No one knows more practically than the Archbishop of Canterbury—and I wish his Grace was now present to confirm this statement—the jobbing, the confusion, the spiritual destitution which rioted in Bath during the mental incapacity of Bishop Law, and the physical incapacity of Bishop Bagot. The Archbishop might be appealed to with confidence, as able to testify both as to the damage sustained by the temporalities of Bath, and as to the neglect of its spiritual interests.”

Immense evils arose, as Bishop Stanley felt to his cost, through the long incapacity of Bishop Bathurst in the diocese of Norwich, and during the whole of his episcopacy it required all his energies to bring that diocese again into proper order. To show you the labours of the Bishop of London—how impossible it is that commissaries should discharge those duties, and how necessary it is that there should be one living and active superintendence over that great diocese—let me give you some little description of his ordinary duties. I have been reminded of a passage in one of Sydney Smith's letters about the Church, in which it is said that the Bishop of London devotes eight or ten hours a day to the business of his diocese, and gives labour enough to govern the empire. The Bishop has been used to have one day in the week at London House, and in the height of the season, two days on which clergy and laity could consult him. On these days the whole time—from nine o'clock in the morning till five or six o'clock in the afternoon—was occupied in personal interviews and discussions. All these interviews, of such great service in bringing together the Bishop and his clergy and laity, and in making the business of the diocese work smoothly, must be suspended for an indefinite period in the case of an interregnum. And here let me recur to the difficulties and confusion which arose in the diocese of Bath and Wells, because I received this morning a letter from a layman of great experience, a solicitor living in that diocese, who was personally cognisant of many of the mischiefs which were occasioned there by the interregnum to which I have alluded. He says—

“The system pursued in this diocese (Bath and Wells) during the interregnum of Bishop Law’s infirmities was to leave the affairs of each arch-deaconry in the hands of the rural deans, generally speaking young and inexperienced clergymen, and between whom and their brethren in the ministry constant differences were arising. Unseemly disputes about the Church patronage became the subjects of general scandal, and, although the Church of England in the populous city of Bath and the county of Somerset had been for a long series of years most popular, its popularity would, I believe, have been well nigh lost had such a state of things continued. I am speaking from my own personal observation, but I do feel solemnly that the case of this diocese is a frightful example of what such a state of things as now exists in the dioceses of London and Durham may come to. And sure I am that no real friend of the Church can desire to see a repetition in the metropolis of England of that which I, in common with others, have mourned over in the diocese of Bath.”

So long as there is one head responsible for the conduct of these affairs they may go on well in London; but when all these facilities for jobbing and misappropriation are given, and there is no responsibility and superintendence on the part of the Bishop, I do gather that the very worst consequences will ensue in the case of any interregnum. My noble Friend the Chairman of Committees (Lord Redesdale)—and anything which falls from him cannot fail to be listened to with great attention—says this state of things has gone on for a very considerable time, and he asks why it might not continue for six months longer? Now, it is very well for certain parties in the State to make use of that argument, but I am astounded that it should be urged in the House of Lords, and by a person of the experience of my noble Friend. If this state of things, my Lords, can go on without mischief for six months, it may go on for six—for sixty years—for an indefinite time—in short, until masses of the people are brought to the conviction that the Bishop of London is a name and not a reality. When, too, I find a right rev. Prelate making use of the same argument—when I hear it urged that the Bishop of Oxford is capable of presiding for the time over the diocese of London—will it not be immediately said that there are evidently too many Bishops by half, and that they might be reduced, without public detriment, to a very limited number? I may, perhaps, be more sensitive on this subject than many of your Lordships, but I am conversant with the opinions expressed by many classes of the community on this subject, and I know it is said that Bishops have nothing whatever to do, that their incomes are too large, and that their numbers might well be diminished. The language employed in this House, by which it seems to be inferred that the Bishop of Oxford could preside over the diocese of London, and the Bishop of Manchester over that of Durham, and that no great and irreparable mischiefs would ensue in consequence, is language which could hardly be expected from those who have always been urging the necessity of extending the episcopate. It is curious enough that whenever the number of Bishops is to be increased we hear exaggerated statements of their duties (though I am one of those who think that they have many and great duties to perform), while, now that such a Bill as the present comes before your Lordships, I find that the labours of the Bishops are made light of, and we are told they consist mainly of consecrations and confirmations. [“No, no!”] No! Why, did not the Bishop of Exeter say that the time for confirmations and consecrations was now nearly over, and that little or no business of any serious importance remained for the Bishop, as a proof of which he said that the right rev. Prelate had been in the habit of taking his vacation and of disporting himself in foreign parts about this time of the year. I am certain that the country will interpret such language in the sense I have mentioned, and if they see a continuance of this state of things, and one Bishop doing the duty of another Bishop, they will argue that one-half the number would be sufficient. Having pointed out what the prospects of the diocese of London are likely to be should any interregnum of this kind occur, I have only in conclusion to express the hope that your Lordships will give your earnest consideration to the welfare of the immense population of the two dioceses thus deprived of their Bishops, and will pass this Bill, notwithstanding the charge of its being a simoniacal measure.

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, I do not think that my noble Friend has been exceedingly appropriate in his arguments in relation to the matter in hand, because he has in forcible language—which he, indeed, always uses—asserted that the prolongation of the interregnum in any of those sees is a matter of serious inconvenience and considerable objection. That is a point which, though my noble Friend has laboured much to prove, is one which is admitted upon every side; and the only question to be decided by those who are now discussing this Bill is, whether on the whole we shall not incur the greatest prospective evil by adopting a partial and imperfect measure like the present, which is, I believe, more calculated to impede than to forward subsequent legislation, than by the postponement of the introduction of any Bill on the subject until we have time to deal with the general question, which general measure would materially advance the great object which your Lordships have in view. My noble Friend has, I think, very much exaggerated the effect of the language which fell from the right rev. Prelate the other night. I was present on that occasion, and what the right rev. Prelate did say was, that of all times of the year the inconvenience would be least felt at the present, inasmuch as the active duties—those of confirmation and consecration—are over; and during the remaining portion of the year the Bishops have the less laborious duties to discharge. And I must say that it is a perversion of the obvious meaning of the right rev. Prelate's language to assume that either he or any other noble Lord who has taken part in discussing this question, has maintained that, during the remaining portion of the year the life of a Bishop is an idle one, or that the number of Bishops is greater than is sufficient to perform the duties of that office. For my own part, I frankly say I think that the number of the episcopal bench is not sufficient; but that is not the question now before your Lordships. I am happy to find it acknowledged on both sides of the House that the duties of a Bishop are so important, and that there is so little superfluity of episcopal attendance, it becomes a matter of vital importance that provision should be made for the resignation and retirement of those Bishops who are rendered incapable of the discharge of their duties. I am glad to see that it is so admitted; and the question is by what description of legislation we can best attain that object. The only question raised now is whether we shall go into Committee before we have received the communications made by the right rev. Prelates to the Government which have led to this mutual understanding. It was my intention to have adverted—and I had risen for that purpose—to the misrepresentation of the noble and learned Lord Chief Justice of what had been said by the right rev. Prelate opposite; but as the right rev. Prelate has himself vindicated his own expressions I do not think it necessary to return to that question. The obvious intent and meaning of the right rev. Prelate being this—that the object of the Bill is to legalise that which, if this Bill did not pass, would be simoniacal, and making that legal in the case of these two Bishops, which, if this Bill passed, would exempt them from the operation of the law in respect to pains and penalties, and if such an act had been performed by other parties would, by the general law of the Church, be considered an act of simony. The acumen of the noble and learned Lord, and his long professional experience, might enable him to turn and twist the argument as he pleased—and no person is more capable of doing so in support of his particular views—but it is impossible, with all his ability, to torture the observations of the right rev. Prelate into any other meaning than this—that the contemplated arrangements made by the retiring Prelates without the sanction of this Bill might be construed into an act of simony. In making these observations I am bound to say I have no doubt whatever that those retiring Prelates have consented to those arrangements with the best and the purest intentions. I should like to ask my noble Friend (the Earl of Shaftesbury) if he feel so strongly the evils and inconveniences arising from the interregnum in the dioceses of London and Durham, why he does not feel with equal force the evils and inconveniences which are sustained in other dioceses—to which I have no hesitation in referring—I mean the archbishopric of York and the diocese of Norwich? He admits the inconveniences of these arrangements, and I agree with him as to the mischief of these toties quoties arrangements; and therefore it is that I now, as I did upon a former occasion, press upon your Lordships the expediency of dealing with the whole question by a general measure and not by a measure admitting the principle of negotiation between the Minister of the day and the individual concerned. That is a principle involved in this question which in my mind is sufficient to outweigh the serious and grave inconveniences which arise from the continued suspension of the functions of these Prelates. The principle is a bad one in itself, and I can see that grave inconveniences may arise from suspicions engendered as to the motives which may lead to the retirement of a Bishop. The particular circumstances of this case enable your Lordships to afford a retirement to these Bishops, and will enable you to carry those arrangements into effect. The consequence would infallibly be, that when there are not such means of providing for such retirement from the superfluities of the incomes attached to the sees, that then it would be necessary to make some further special arrangements to meet the difficulties of the case. And, therefore, if you rest this case upon the peculiar circumstance that you are enabled to do it without endangering the common fund, you will virtually negative the possibility of doing that which you admit to be desirable to have done by a general law applicable to all sees. Before I sit down I wish to ask the Government whether they will consent that the annual sum of money which will be saved by the effect of these arrangements shall be held in abeyance until a general measure be passed to form the nucleus of a surplus fund which shall be applicable to the general retirement of Bishops. If Her Majesty's Government are prepared to give this assurance—if they say they do intend to bring forward a general measure at the earliest possible period of the next Session of Parliament, and that they will reserve by those arrangements a fund to meet the requirements of a general measure, they will then, to a certain extent, remove the very serious objections which I entertain towards this particular measure. I hope Her Majesty's Government will be able to give a definite declaration to this effect, because it would remove one of the greatest objections of those who oppose this measure, namely, that you are by this Bill depriving yourselves of the means of effecting a general measure of retirement hereafter. With regard to the question of your Lordships' going into Committee, I am unwilling to throw any obstacles in the way of Her Majesty's Government at this advanced period of the Session; but I think, before this measure is finally carried through this House, it is important that we should be officially and formally in possession of the previous understanding which has existed, and of the previous correspondence which has existed on this subject. I trust my noble Friend and the right rev. Prelate will not, under such circumstances persist in their opposition to this Bill going into Committee, and that they will permit the Government to make such Amendments in the Bill as they may think necessary, and that Her Majesty's Government will then afford time and opportunity to your Lordships for the consideration of the effects of the measure, both upon the bringing up of the Report and upon the third reading. I have just ventured to throw out these suggestions because I really do not wish in any way to retard the progress of public business.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY wished to explain that he had not intended to represent those who opposed the present Bill, as thinking that a Bishop led a life of idleness. What he intended to say was that, if noble Lords voted for a prolongation of the present state of things in the sees of London and Durham, people out of doors might draw that inference.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY said, it appeared that both sides seemed to agree in theory, but what they wanted to do was to go beyond theory to practice. The argument of his noble Friend opposite was, that if they postponed this Bill, there would be a better chance of passing a general measure in a future Session. That might be the case, but with regard to any surplus that might accrue under the proposed arrangement, the only pledge the Government could give was, that it should not be appropriated to any purpose without the sanction and authority of Parliament.

Motion agreed to.

House in Committee, accordingly.

Clause 1,

THE BISHOP OF OXFORD proposed, as an Amendment, that the pensions under the Bill should not come into operation until the Archbishops had accepted the resignation of the Prelates.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 3,

THE DUKE OF CLEVELAND said, that he had intended to move, that the retiring allowance to the Bishop of Durham should be £6,000 a year, the same as that proposed for the Bishop of London; but, as his right rev. Friend had expressed a wish that such a proposition should not be made to their Lordships, he should abandon his intention of bringing the subject forward.

THE EARL OF GALLOWAY felt strongly that £6,000 a year was too large an amount for Parliament to grant to a retiring Christian Bishop. The attention of the public at large had been very much directed of late to our Church Establishment, and a great deal of jealousy existed in the minds of a considerable portion of the community with regard to it. Much of that jealousy had, in his opinion, no foundation in reason; and, upon that account, he was the more desirous that Parliament should not pass any measure which would occasion a just cause of complaint, such as he thought would be created if so large a salary as £6,000 a year were to be granted to a retiring Bishop—a sum larger than the full salary enjoyed by many of the right rev. Prelates who were able to perform the duties of their high office. His main ground of objection to the measure, however, was, that it was not of a general character, for he feared that by now sanctioning so large a retiring allowance as £6,000 a year, their Lordships would create an inconvenient precedent which might greatly hamper them in years to come. He was not prepared with a distinct proposition on the subject, but he thought that one-third of the future salary of £10,000 a year would be an ample allowance for the retiring Bishop of London. In making these observations, he desired to add, that he felt the utmost respect and veneration for the right rev. Prelate, to whom this retiring pension was proposed to be given.

VISCOUNT DUNGANNON said, that he entirely concurred with the noble Earl, in thinking that the retiring allowance in question was not only beyond bounds, but under the circumstances enormous. Independent of the allowance of £6,000 a year, the Bishop of London was to have the palace at Fulham for life; while the Bishop of Durham was to have only £4,500 a year without a residence. The apportionment of the allowances was by no means equal. Considering that the income of the future Bishops of London was to be limited to £10,000 a year, and also that the incomes of the other working Bishops had of late years been materially curtailed through the means of the Ecclesiastical Commission, he conceived that a retiring pension of about £3,000 a year would be amply sufficient for the present Bishop of London. It was not right, in his opinion, to make this retiring pension greater in amount by £1,000 or £1,500 a year than the income allotted to many of the working Bishops. He thoroughly and entirely disliked the present Bill, and regarded it as one of the most mischievous measures ever introduced under a plausible pretext. He looked upon it as the more dangerous, because the case was a strong one, though it was not stronger than were the cases at the present moment of the Archbishopric of York and the Bishopric of Norwich. He was at a loss to understand what material evil could have resulted from the Bill being postponed until an early period in next Session. He wished not to be understood as entertaining the slightest disrespect towards the right rev. Prelate, on whose retiring pension he had commented, as he felt for him the utmost veneration. A more essentially useful and thoroughly worthy Prelate never adorned the episcopal bench, and it was matter of deep regret, in reference to the best interests of the Church, that, by the dispensation of Providence, he should be placed in a position which obliged him to relinquish his see.

LORD WYNFORD observed, that a special justification for the amount of the proposed retiring allowance existed in the fact of the splendid and munificent acts of charity for which the Bishop of London was distinguished.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR also adverted to the Bishop of London's munificent charity, which, he was understood to say, occasioned to that right rev. Prelate the expenditure of about £15,000 a year; and of the proposed retiring allowance of £6,000 a year, there was no doubt that a large proportion would go in charity.

Clause agreed to.

THE BISHOP OF OXFORD gave notice that he should, at a future stage, move the introduction of a clause to the effect, that the sums received from time to time by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners from the revenues of the sees of London and Durham should be carried to a separate account, until Parliament had decided whether any provision should be made for the retirement from their offices of Bishops unable, through age or infirmity, to discharge their duties.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, July 17, 1856.

MINUTES.] NEW WRIT.—For Dorchester, v. Henry Gerard Sturt, esq., Chiltern Hundreds.

PUBLIC BILLS.—2^d Charities; Vice President of Committee of Council on Education; Evidence in Foreign Suits; Cursitor Baron of the Exchequer.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. MOWBRAY said, he thought some explanation ought to be given by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the second reading of the Bill at that late period of the Session. Last year, at a late period of the Session, a Bill was introduced and passed for exempting Roman Catholic charities from the supervision of the Charity Commission, and now at this late period of the Session this Bill was introduced for continuing that exemption. He saw no reason for such exemption, and should therefore move that the Bill be read a second time that day three months. If that should not be adopted, he should move in Committee that the duration of the Bill should be to the 1st of June instead of the 1st of September.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

MR. BAINES said, there were a great number of Roman Catholic charities founded by Roman Catholics for the very best purposes, but in many of them there were certain things mixed up which might be construed into superstitious use, and hence the whole by that might be vitiated and rendered void. It was, therefore, thought expedient to exempt such charities from the usual supervision of the Charity Commissioners. For instance, in many of these excellent and most valuable charities there were provisions for certain masses to be said for certain purposes. In examining into such charities, the Commissioners could, if necessary, have to report upon the fact of such charities containing such provisions, and that would of necessity make void the whole of the charity. He, therefore, asked the House to agree to carry on the exemption for another year, and by next Session a general measure would be introduced, which, he trusted, would meet the whole necessities of the case. He could assure the House that he was as much averse to the present state of things as any one, and he would pledge himself before next Session to do all in his power to advance the general remedy that was required. Under those circumstances, he therefore hoped the hon. Gentleman would withdraw his Amendment.

MR. HADFIELD said, he thought there was that in these charities which required the proposed exemption to be extended or provided for in this Bill. He thought the general law of mortmain ought to be revised as speedily as possible; for all sects, the Established Church as much as any, suffered from it. He gave his cordial support to this measure. It was greatly to be regretted, that so many of the Bills brought in by the Government were postponed to that late period of the Session.

MR. BARROW said, he understood that it was not intended that the Charity Commissioners were to have any power over county hospitals and county asylums which were supported by voluntary contributions. But he found that some of those institutions had been called upon by the Commissioners to furnish copies of their accounts. Now, that proceeding had given great offence to the trustees of those charities, and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Baines) would except from his measure institutions that were solely maintained by the voluntary contributions of the public.

MR. SPOONER said, he was quite satisfied with the assurance given by the right hon. Gentleman, that he would be prepared next Session to place Roman Catholic charities under the same control as other charities were subjected to.

MR. HENLEY said, he was surprised that this Continuance Bill should have been brought forward. There was a most distinct pledge given by the Government, when the Charity Bill was passed, that if the House consented at that time not to deal with Roman Catholic charities, a Bill would be brought in upon that subject. He need not say that he did not believe any one of the proper and legitimate objects of those charities would be interfered with. He thought a distinct and positive pledge ought to be given by the Government, that the subject should be legislated upon early in the next Session.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he was glad to find that no observations had been made calculated to prejudice the question before the House. The case of Roman Catholic charities was one of a special description, and could not be dealt with without full consideration being given to all the special circumstances connected with it. It was hoped that the Bill formerly introduced by the hon. and learned Member for Durham (Mr. Atherton) which passed the House of Commons, would have removed many of the difficulties connected with the Roman Catholic charities; but, unfortunately, that Bill did not meet with the assent of the House of Lords. He hoped the House would be content with the pledge given by his right hon. Friend (Mr. Baines), that the subject should receive his attention at an early period next Session.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he hoped the Government would insert a clause in the Bill to exempt county asylums and hospitals from the control of the Commissioners. He quite agreed with the hon. Member (Mr. Hadfield) that legislation, at a very late period of the Session, became a perfect lottery. He thought it would be better if Government struck out of the list of the Orders of the Day every Bill they did not intend to proceed with.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, it would very much surprise him to find that any interference had been attempted with any institution supported wholly by voluntary contributions. He thought it would be found that the application to the Nottinghamshire charities had been for accounts relating to their income arising from endowments. With respect to the question of introducing measures early in the Session as had been alluded to in the course of the discussion, he had himself brought in measures of great public importance as early as the end of February, but he had been wholly unable to find an opportunity of again bringing them on, and he had in consequence been compelled to withdraw them. Indeed, until some division was made between what might be called the legislative and the political business of the House, it would be hopeless to expect that measures of legislative importance would not often be postponed to matters of more pressing political interest.

MR. MOWBRAY said, after the assurance of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Baines), that he would introduce a Bill on the subject next Session, he would withdraw his Amendment. But not feeling quite so satisfied of the disposition of the Government on the subject, he should in Committee move that the Bill be extended only to the 1st of July, instead of, as proposed, the 1st of September.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read 2^o.

HOSPITALS (DUBLIN) BILL.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made and Question proposed, "that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair."

MR. COWAN said, it was his intention to move, that the Bill be committed that day three months. It was from no want of sympathy for the inmates of the Dublin hospitals that he took that course. It was at once the glory and one of the most precious and palpable evidences of our common Christianity that such institutions existed, and he should greatly regret if the step he now took should, in the slightest degree, impair the usefulness of those charities, or close the portals of those hospitals against the admission of any one who required their aid. But he thought the course of the present and former Governments in respect to these hospitals to have been unwise and vacillating, and neither fair nor honest. He did not see why Dublin should enjoy a privilege which other large cities and towns did not enjoy. Edinburgh, for instance, was distinguished for its medical schools, and was as much entitled, in his belief, to receive a grant from the public fund as the Irish capital. He was informed by Sir William Gibson Craig, that the grants which had been made to the Irish hospitals would in a few years cease and determine. In 1844, a resolution was come to by the Government, that the grants should be reduced 10 per cent every year, and the hospitals be left to be supported by the subscriptions of the charitable and humane. That was acted upon for some time; but on the Motion of the hon. Member for Dublin, a Committee on the subject was appointed, and the present Bill was the result of the Report of that Committee. The tendency of the Bill was to place those hospitals permanently as a charge upon the Consolidated Fund. If the House continued these grants to Dublin, he saw no reason why they should not be extended to Edinburgh, and, if to Edinburgh, to Glasgow, Liverpool, and other great towns. He found that the Commissioners had laid it down as a rule that no grant should be given to an hospital unless it was also a medical school. He wished to know if the converse was also to be a rule, and every medical school to be entitled to these grants. No doubt a great proportion of the poverty of Scotland arose from immigration from the sister isle; and as Scotch hospitals were freely used by Irish paupers, he thought that was an additional reason why Dublin should not exclusively have the benefit of the public money. The Bill was useful so far as it proposed to deal with admitted abuses in the management of the Dublin hospitals, but he objected to its local operation and character. He hoped, however, that the whole matter would be set at rest by the Government retracing their steps and dealing equal justice to all.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House will, upon this day three months, resolve itself into the said Committee," instead thereof.

MR. HORSMAN said, he hoped the House would not allow itself to be led into a discussion on a question which was not before it. The question they had then to decide, was not whether any grant should be made to the hospitals of Dublin, or whether that grant should be permanent. Those two questions had been already decided upon by a Resolution of a Committee and a Vote of that House. What the House then had to do was, to carry into effect the object of Parliament in making that grant. A Commission issued last year had reported the manner in which these grants of money had been hitherto applied. For many years these grants had been annually voted. In 1854, the subject of the grants was submitted to a Committee of inquiry, and which Committee recommended the continuance of them. The question which Government had then to consider was, whether those grants were wisely and well applied. With a view to ascertain that fact, a Commission was appointed to inquire into the condition and regulations of the medical institutions of the city of Dublin; and the present Bill was founded on the recommendations of that Commission. The Bill was not a Bill for granting money to those institutions, but was for the better regulation of the hospitals in Dublin. If Parliament should, next Session, refuse this grant, then the interference of Government would cease, but so long as the grants were continued, no one could deny that the Government had a right to provide for the better regulation of the hospitals. Under those circumstances, he hoped the House would allow the Bill to go into Committee.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, the object of the Bill was plain and unmistakeable; it was to fix the maintenance of those hospitals on the public taxes. It was an insult to the subscribers to those hospitals to suppose that they could not properly manage and conduct them. If the power of appointing the governors and officers of those charities were vested in the hands of the Lord Lieutenant, he would make use of that patronage for political jobbery. No other part of the Kingdom would come to that House and ask for charity out of the public taxes to support their institutions. He was surprised that the pride and national feeling of the people of Dublin allowed them to accept such charity. The result of the passing of the Bill would be that the maintenance of the institutions would be saddled on the public taxes.

COLONEL FRENCH said, he must remind the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Cowan) that grants had been made for the promotion of works in Scotland as well as in England. He might mention the Caledonian Canal as an instance. Therefore it could not be urged as a special ground of objection that this grant was exclusively for the benefit of Ireland, seeing that similar grants had been made for works in other parts of the United Kingdom.

MR. MICHELL said, he thought that it was the duty of the Government to extend hospitals all over the country. He should certainly support the Government in the measure under consideration. The opposition to the grant, he considered, was disgraceful in those who exhibited it. The grant was only of £15,000, and yet they made no objection to the expense of going to Aldershot to reviews, and for sending rockets into the air to please the Londoners. The expense in the course of the year for reviews and fireworks, and eating and drinking of the Houses of Parliament, in going to reviews at Aldershot, and for paying for railway fares to Portsmouth and Southampton, could not have been less than £100,000. No objection was made to dip into the public purse for those purposes, but when a sum of £15,000 was proposed for charitable purposes in Ireland, objections were immediately raised.

MR. HADFIELD said, he could not understand why the city of Dublin should be paid a sum of £15,000 a year to support its charitable institutions. The question was whether the charge was to be permanently settled upon the country. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for Ireland had said that the object of the Bill was to guard against abuses; but his belief was that it was really to make it the means of ultimately imposing this charge upon the Consolidated Fund. He thought that the Irish Members, for the honour of their country, should put an end to these applications for charity, which were only to support abuses in Ireland.

MR. NAPIER said, that hon. Gentlemen were going away from the real object of the Bill. It was not whether a grant should be made, for that had already been agreed to. It was to make a great medical school as efficient as possible. The hospitals had produced many eminent medical men for the army, navy, and general service of the country. But those hospitals could not be kept up by means of their ordinary resources. It, therefore, became necessary to make a grant, and the object of the Bill was to regulate the application of that grant.

MR. CRAUFURD said, that the objection which he entertained to the Bill was, that it was intended to confer upon the hospitals of Dublin a Parliamentary title to an annual grant out of the Consolidated Fund, which no other similar institution asked for. None of the London hospitals received any public grant.

MR. VANCE said, there was nothing in the Report of the Commissioners which impugned the administration of those grants. Those grants were originally made by the Irish Parliament. The grants were also made by the British Parliament for twenty years after the Union, under the impression that the Union would produce great prosperity, and in twenty years render the grants unnecessary. Such, however, was not the effect of it. The Union had removed the nobility and the wealthy commoners, and Dublin, from being the city of the rich, had become the city of the poor. For that reason he maintained that Dublin had a prescriptive right to those grants.

MR. ALEXANDER HASTIE said, that the argument of the right hon. Secretary for Ireland was very ingenious. It was true there was not one word in the Bill having reference to money, and yet the fact was that the whole case turned upon and had reference to a pecuniary grant. These grants were most unpopular with his constituents. The hospital at Glasgow was quite as extensive and efficient as the one in Dublin, yet that received no Parliamentary grant.

MR. WILSON said that, although he agreed with the recommendation of the first Committee on this subject, that the grant to these hospitals should be gradually reduced, and, although he was opposed to the appointment of the second Commission, yet since that Commission had recommended the continuance of the grant, he considered it the duty of the Government to give effect to that recommendation.

House in Committee.

Clauses 1 to 8 agreed to.

Clause 9 (Lord Lieutenant may grant Superannuations to the Officers of the Hospitals).

MR. W. BROWN said, he should move that the clause be omitted.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the circumstances relating to these officers were different from ordinary cases, and he must support the clause as it stood.

SIR JAMES ANDERSON said, he considered that granting pensions to officers who were no longer able to discharge their duties was introducing a new principle into those institutions, for which he did not see any necessity.

MR. MONTAGU CHAMBERS said, he also objected to the clause. Men were glad to obtain the reputation of having passed their days at the public hospitals, without asking for a pension.

MR. HORSMAN said, that the subject had undergone great consideration, and that these superannuation allowances had been more than once recommended to the House.

SIR DENHAM NORREYS said, he objected to the principle of allowing the governors of hospitals to diminish the funds by granting superannuations.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 43; Noes 29: Majority 14.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 10 to 13 were also agreed to.

Clause 14 (Lord Lieutenant may appoint a Secretary to the Board).

MR. HORSMAN said, he should move that the salary be £300 a year.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD said, the amount was excessive, and he should move that the salary be only £150 a year.

Question put, "That the blank be filled with the word 'three.'"

The Committee divided:—Ayes 26; Noes 51: Majority 25.

MR. HORSMAN said, it was impossible that any medical gentleman could be prevailed upon to accept the office of secretary at so small a sum as £150 a year. He hoped the hon. and learned Gentleman would be satisfied with the result of the division which had just taken place, and let the question stand over for consideration.

MR. G. A. HAMILTON said, the question was whether it was desirable that the secretary should be a medical man. There were on the staff of these institutions some of the most eminent medical men of the country, who bestowed vast time on the management of the institutions, and therefore it did not so much require that the person who performed the duties of secretary should be a medical man. He believed there would be no difficulty in obtaining an efficient person at a salary of £200 a year.

MR. VANCE said, he had heard of men who were perfectly competent to discharge the required duties, and who would readily accept the office at a salary of £150 a year.

The Motion was then put and agreed to, and the blank was filled up with £150.

Remaining Clauses agreed to.

House resumed.

Bill reported, as amended.

GENERAL BEATSON.

MR. ROEBUCK said, by some mistake a Motion of his had been put on the paper for that night instead of for Tuesday next. It was as follows:—

"That the Under Secretary for War having admitted that, upon anonymous information, a secret inquiry had been ordered into the conduct of a general officer, this House feels itself bound to express its reprobation of such a proceeding."

MR. FREDERICK PEEL said, he wished to offer some explanation on the subject.

MR. ROEBUCK: Had you not better defer it until I have made the Motion?

MR. FREDERICK PEEL: No; it is pressing. As regards the conduct of General Vivian—

MR. ROEBUCK: Sir, I rise to order. How can I answer the statement of the hon. Gentleman when there is no Motion before the House?

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman can only make his explanation under the indulgence of the House.

MR. FREDERICK PEEL: The point, Sir, is simply this. Certain charges have been made against General Beatson in connexion with transferring the command of the Turkish Contingent, and they came to the knowledge of the War Office through—

MR. G. A. HAMILTON said, the hon. Member was clearly out of order.

MR. LABOUCHERE: My hon. Friend simply intends to offer a personal explanation.

COLONEL FRENCH: I rise to order, Sir. This discussion is quite irregular, and ought not to be continued.

MR. FREDERICK PEEL: I only wish to say—

MR. ROEBUCK—Order, order. Sir, I insist the hon. Member is quite out of order.

MR. SPEAKER ruled that the hon. Member was out of order, and the matter dropped.

DECIMAL COINAGE—QUESTION.

MR. G. A. HAMILTON said, he would beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when it was likely that the Report of the Commissioners on the Decimal Coinage question would be presented?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the Commissioners had taken various steps for the purpose of obtaining information on the subject referred to them, but they would not be in a position to make a Report in sufficient time to admit of its being laid on the table during the course of the present Session.

CIVIL SERVICE VACANCIES—QUESTION.

MR. G. A. HAMILTON said, he wished also to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in order to extend the principle of competitive examination for civil offices, what means it was intended to take to make known to the public the vacancies which from time to time might arise in the several public departments, or the steps which it might be requisite to be taken by candidates, in order to their selection by the heads of departments, for competitive examination?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he was not able to state what means in particular would be adopted for circulating the information referred to. Inquiries might be addressed to the heads of the departments in which vacancies occurred; but he was not aware that there was any necessity to take additional means for spreading information, for whenever a vacancy did occur the Government were instantly overwhelmed with applications for it.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT IN THE COLONIES—QUESTION.

MR. W. EWART said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether measures would be adopted for further mitigating the laws imposing capital punishment in the Colonies, in conformity with the laws imposing capital punishment in Great Britain?

MR. LABOUCHERE said, it was quite true that, although generally the law of capital punishment in the Colonies differed little in practice from that which was established in this country, yet there were exceptions to the rule—in Ceylon, for instance, where the old Roman and Dutch law prevailed; some of the West India islands, where there were many obsolete laws yet in force; and in the Australian colonies, where capital punishments had very recently been carried out in cases of aggravated burglary. In the case of Ceylon and the West India Islands he was quite ready to consider whether it might not be advisable to remove those laws from the Statute-book, but the Australian colonies had their own local Legislatures, which were the best judges of the cases in which capital punishment ought to be carried out.

THE CAPE OF GOOD HOPE—QUESTION.

MR. CHEETHAM said, he wished to inquire whether the Government were in possession of any later intelligence from the Cape of Good Hope on the subject of the hostile attitude of the Kafirs.

MR. HINDLEY said, he would also beg to inquire whether the colony or the mother country would bear the expense of any military proceedings necessary to suppress an outbreak?

MR. LABOUCHERE said, that the latest information which he had received from the Governor of the Cape of Good Hope, dated, he believed, the 1st of May, was, that although there had been great apprehensions of the existence of a widespread confederacy among the native tribes to attack the colonists, yet up to that date no actual aggression had taken place, and he entertained the confident expectation that no such act would occur. Nevertheless, the Government had, as a matter of precaution, ordered considerable reinforcements to the Cape of Good Hope. The expense of sending those military reinforcements would be borne by the mother country.

PUBLIC BUSINESS—QUESTION.

MR. HADFIELD said, he must again advert to the large amount of public business on the paper at that late period of the Session, he would beg to ask the noble Lord at the head of the Government whether he could state which Bills would be proceeded with, and which abandoned. There were four Bills with regard to which he was particularly anxious to learn that information, they were the Vice President of Committee of Council on Education Bill, the new Appropriation of Trust Property Bill, the Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Bill, and the Lords Amendments to the Cambridge University Bill.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, that the hon. Member appeared to wish for a catalogue of massacre, but execution had been done upon the innocents, one by one, so completely that little remained to be told. The intention of the Government with regard to each Bill would be stated as it came on. With regard to the Bills to which the hon. Member had particularly referred, he might state that the Vice President of the Council on Education Bill would certainly be proceeded with; as to the Criminal Appropriation of Trust Property Bill his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General would on the following day state his intentions; the Lords Amendments to the Cambridge University Bill would be considered to-morrow. The Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Bill was a most important measure, involving questions of great magnitude, upon which very considerable difference of opinion might exist, and as many persons had left town he did not think it would be desirable to press the House to come to a decision upon it. It was the intention of the Government to introduce a Bill upon the subject into that House at the beginning of the next Session. It was unnecessary to say what changes might, upon consideration, be made in the measure; but the Government certainly would not include in their Bill the 24th clause of the present one, which prohibited marriage between the parties convicted of adultery. Doing full justice to the motives of those who introduced that clause, he was of opinion that that would be not only a cruel but an immoral provision.

Mr. G. A. Hamilton

BIENNIAL GRANT TO THE SCOTCH EPISCOPAL CHURCH—QUESTION.

MR. GORDON said, he wished to ask the hon. Gentleman the Secretary of the Treasury if he would have any objection to state that the Biennial Grant to the Episcopal Church of Scotland was not withdrawn because it had been misapplied. Such an impression had obtained some prevalence in Scotland.

MR. WILSON said, that the Government had no reason to believe that the grant had been applied to any but the purpose for which it was intended. It had never been placed upon the Votes, but had been made upon the responsibility of the Government, and defrayed out of the Vote for civil contingencies for the ensuing year. It had become the duty of the Government to consider whether they should withdraw the grant, or should place it regularly upon the Votes; and they had adopted the former course.

CORRUPT PRACTICES PREVENTION BILL.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MR. H. BERKELEY said, he rose to move that the Committee should be deferred for three months. He should have opposed the Bill upon its second reading; but, owing to the extraordinary manner in which, at this period of the Session, Bills jumped through stages, and perhaps, also, to the studied want of articulation on the part of some Members of the Government, he had failed to seize the proper moment for doing so. He trusted that the House would not forget that this Bill, which was the Act of 1854 redivivus, was first introduced immediately after a general election, during which both the great parties in that House had used every means and appliance to obtain a majority. The consequence was, John Bull and his family had been, as usual, coaxed, cajoled, bought, sold, bullied, intimidated, and screwed. The present Bill had been brought forward as a substitute for the proposition which he and the 224 lunatics in that House who did him the honour to agree with him in opinion regarded as an efficient remedy for a most deplorable and dishonourable state of things. But it had proved a most inadequate substitute, and he still adhered to the opinion that the true remedy was to be found in the Motion which he had repeatedly submitted to the consideration of the House. That Motion had been received in some quarters with ridicule, and it had been said that it came round regularly every year with green peas. From others it had experienced still more unworthy treatment, and the noble Lord at the head of the Government had endeavoured to put it down by pooh-poohing it in that easy, jovial, and offhand style for which he was so celebrated. However, he (Mr. H. Berkeley) would not trespass on the attention of the House with any further allusions to his Motion. He would endeavour that evening to avoid the question of the ballot. He had nothing whatever to do with it; his concern was with the Bill that had been substituted for it. As regarded that Bill what course had been taken? When it was found that the state of the country was so bad that something must be done the usual safety valve was opened—a Select Committee of that House. It was agreed that the corrupt affairs of the country should be submitted to a Committee. That Committee sent down a Bill which was laid upon the table of the House, and, after it had been cut and mutilated and shorn of all its valuable attributes, it was transmitted in a completely emasculated condition to the House of Lords. There it was received with vast approbation, for their aristocratic neighbours appeared to take delight in adopting measures which, while they pretended to do a great deal, in fact did nothing. Just such a measure was the one in question, for, while it affected to promote reform, it was in reality conservative of corruption. That was a proposition which he hoped to demonstrate to the satisfaction of the House. The Bill passed rapidly through the Upper House, and receiving the Royal Assent became the law of the land. It was then noticed by that great member of the press, The Times. In the columns of that journal there appeared a very able analysis of the Bill, said to be from the pen of an eminent Parliamentary casuist.

The Editor of The Times pronounced the Bill to be a "pompous profession;" intended to be inoperative. In that dictum there was a serious accusation against that House—an accusation of hypocrisy, which he, who had the honour to be a Member, would not presume to iterate. With reference, however, to the Bill itself, he would take leave to say that, having been tested throughout the country, it was found to be "inoperative." That it was a "pompous profession" no hon. Member would venture to deny. Its avowed object was to prevent bribery and undue influence, and the preamble set forth that it was intended to promote the freedom of election. That was on the face of it a "pompous profession;" and, if it could be also shown that the Bill was "inoperative," there would be ample justification for the course he was about to take in imploring the House not to stultify itself by perpetuating such a statute. He had before him a list of boroughs in which elections had taken place since the passing of the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act, and as regarded those boroughs the press had been almost unanimous in stating that the Act had been quite inefficacious to correct the grievances complained of. This being so, the First Minister of the Crown would have done well to attend to the representations both of the press and of the persons who had petitioned that House, and to refer the Bill to a Select Committee, instead of contenting himself with simply moving that the Bill be read a Second time. The following summary, the accuracy of which might be relied on, would show how utterly useless for all practical purposes the Act had proved:—

Abingdon: Electors did not vote more independently than before. Screw used, especially where there were debts. Many who had promised to vote one way voted the other. The new Act useless. Bedford: Bribery suspected to have been practised to a great extent. The screw used more than ever. New Act a failure. Barnstaple: The Act had no effect whatever in enabling men to vote more independently. Frome: The screw strong as ever, the signs of bribery as apparent. Dinners given, and travelling expenses paid. Workpeople publicly told they might vote as they pleased, but privately had such intimations given to them as showed them that they would be turned off if they did. Many tradesmen voted against their party, their convictions, their friends.

Mr. H. Berkeley

Exclusive dealing after the election practised by non-electors to a great extent. Maldon: The constituency in no way changed. From the poll it was evident that the screw had been put on with effect. The Act laughed at. Norwich: No difference as to voting of dependents. The Act, as far as intimidation is concerned, waste paper. Portsmouth: Government screw too potent to be resisted. Sunderland: Bribery strongly suspected. Screw decidedly used. Wigan: Screw used as much as ever, unquestionably. The outward signs of bribery apparent. The Act not thought of. Bath: Sixteen cases of intimidation asserted by the candidates. Application for loans as a condition of voting. The Act waste paper. Wells: Bribery, treating, and the screw. The Standard and Globe had drawn faithful pictures of this borough, the latter stating that the Act was not of the slightest use. Both papers could be completely confirmed. Boston: The notoriety of this place for profligate corruption has no way diminished. Colonel Sleight, a late candidate, ready to verify on oath the statement of the papers in this respect. Leominster: The Act had no effect at all. The screw extensively applied. Many persons deterred from voting for fear of offending their employers. Rochester: In the same condition as ever, and loudly calling for the ballot. Such was the unfortunate condition of the boroughs which had had the "benefit" of the Act which the House was now called upon to renew. It was curious to observe with what perverse ingenuity care had been taken to destroy any clause of the Act which seemed likely to work well. The payment of electors' travelling expenses, for instance, was objected to by the Act, and very properly so. Such payments were not only a fertile source of bribery in all places, but in counties they placed the poorer candidate in a less advantageous position than his rich rival. The Judges of the Court of Exchequer had decided, however, that under the Act the travelling expenses might be paid, provided that it could not be proved that the candidate made, or that the elector accepted, the payment with a corrupt intention. Who was to prove the corrupt intention? It was a farce to legislate in that way. What election agent was likely, with this Bill before him, to tell a man, "I shall pay you this sum more than your expenses, and you must go down and vote for Mr. So-and-So?" Why, the agent might send the voter down, and then somebody else might pay him; so that, when they talked of proving a corrupt intent, he recurred to the dictum of The Times, and said it was "a pompous profession, meant to be inoperative." Another provision of the Bill required each candidate, before his nomination, to give to the election auditor, in writing, the names of the agents who alone should have authority to expend money on his behalf, and afterwards to render to the same officer an account of all payments made by them. Thus the old law touching agency was set aside, and, although they might make acknowledged agents answerable, fifty unacknowledged agents might do the work, without any of their acts, however flagrant, affecting the candidate's seat. This so-called improvement of the old law offered direct facilities for bribery. Having carefully guarded the candidate by naming his agents, a body of unacknowledged agents might be let loose, and then anybody from the Carlton or the Reform Club—any man from the moon—might descend upon any borough, as in the case of Aylesbury and Carlisle, and, taking up his station at some hotel, lavish money on behalf of any candidate, and yet that candidate, if returned, would be quite safe in his seat. Instead, therefore, of preventing corruption, this Bill only opened a wider door to it, and was nothing but a false pretence. Such, then, were the sins of commission in this measure; but its sins of omission were quite as flagrant. All who were conversant with the proceedings of the Election Committees well knew that the granting of loans to electors was a mode of purchasing their votes. This was proved before the Rye Committee to have been a fruitful source of bribery in that borough. Yet not one word in this Bill was pointed against that practice. So much as to bribery and corruption, neither of which was touched by this measure. A much more serious part of the question related to intimidation—the great disease of our electoral system. By intimidation the landlord controlled the tenant, the customer controlled the tradesman, the manufacturer controlled the operative, and so on through every grade of society—the great body of the electors being reduced by this engine to the level of political serfs. How, then, did the Bill deal with this widely ramified and inveterate evil?

The 5th clause was supposed to supply a sufficient check for it. The mode, however, by which this was to be done, even if it could be carried into effect, which it could not, was unconstitutional. It violated the rights of property, and consequently also the liberty of the subject. How could an Act of Parliament be defended which pretended to coerce a landlord in the choice of his tenant, and to dictate to a customer what tradesman he should employ? Could they maintain a law imposing penalties to keep a tenant in his holding, and continue to a tradesman his custom? The very attempt to do such a thing was an absurdity. He would not leave the enforcement of this important point to his own feeble advocacy, but beg the House to listen to the opinions of two of the highest authorities, Mr. Macaulay and the late Sir Robert Peel. In an address to the electors of Edinburgh Mr. Macaulay, after arguing that corruption might be reached, and citing instances where men had been imprisoned and fined £500, wound up this portion of the subject thus:—

"You can trace out and punish a man for corruption, or deprive him of all the advantages he has gained by it, but in cases of intimidation the evil cannot be corrected by penal laws. You cannot put them in force without affecting the sacred rights of property. Can I tell a man that he must deal with such and such a tradesman who has voted against him, or that he shall renew a lease to a tenant who has done the same? If I did that, it would destroy the sacred rights of property. What is it the Jew says in the play?"

'I'll not answer that:

But, say, it is my humour.'

Or, as a Christian of my own time expressed himself, 'I have a right to do what I like with my own.' There is a great deal of weight in the reasoning of Shylock and the Duke of Newcastle—'I have a right to do what I like with my own.' If you tell a landlord that he is not to eject a particular tenant, you might as well tell a man that he must employ a particular butcher, and take as much beef from him this year as last. The principle of the rights of property is, that a man is not only to be allowed to dispose of his wealth according to common sense and in an ordinary way, but that he shall be allowed to indulge his whims and caprices, to employ whatever tradesmen and labourers he pleases, and rent, or refuse to rent, his land to tenants according to his own pleasure, however absurd the principle on which he chose to let it to them. The first evening I had a seat in the House of Commons Mr. Poulett Thomson made a Motion for Parliamentary censure on the Duke of Newcastle, in reference to the borough of Newark. Sir Robert Peel opposed the Motion, with his accustomed ability, and with really forcible and unanswerable reasons. He asked if it was meant to be held that the tenant who voted against the landlord was to be kept in his place by penal laws because of his vote? If so, the tenant who wished to keep possession of his tack had only to vote against the landlord, and receive protection from the law. Such is the argument against penal laws in relation to the rights of property. Were they enacted, it would be impossible to tell what the consequences would be, and, therefore, we are obliged to consider whether there is any other means of prevention. The only mode of putting down the practice of intimidation appears to be vote by ballot."

The last sentence that he had read was not necessary to his present argument, but he had quoted it because it was word for word the same language as was used by Daniel Defoe. So much for the principle of the £50 penalty contained in the fifth clause of this Bill. Landlords did not tell their tenants, neither did customers tell their tradesmen, that they were discharged because of their votes. Yet, undoubtedly, tenants and tradesmen were frequently so discharged; and no clause like this, however ingeniously worded, could remedy the evil against which it professed to be directed. He could not describe the virtues of this Bill more forcibly than by adopting the language of an eminent political casuist who wrote in The Times, and upon whose analysis of the measure the editor of The Times pronounced that the Bill was a mockery, meant to be inoperative. He need not quote the analysis of the measure, but the writer said in conclusion:—

"Now, what will be the effect of this new Bill? Direct bribery and the direct use of undue influence will be more difficult and dangerous, but will not be suppressed; greater circumspection and care with whom done will be required; but indirect and circuitous bribery, by payment for fancied services and by feigned ways and means, notices to tenants to quit without reasons assigned, and secret influence, will not be, in the slightest degree affected thereby. A penalty is imposed on a candidate who shall give, be accessory to giving, or shall pay for, any treating; but the penalty attaches only to a candidate. A stranger, a friend, or a body of people may give meat, drink, and entertainment to any extent; the voter corruptly receiving it will lose his vote. But, by the insertion of that word 'corruptly,' the intention is referred to the committee, who will have to decide in each case whether a voter accepted it corruptly or not. By the section prohibiting the giving, or causing to be given, to any voter on the days of nomination or polling, of any refreshment or refreshment ticket, the giving is limited to those two days, and the voter is made the only person to whom it is not lawful to give refreshment; so that on any other day such tickets may be given to a voter, and to any but a voter on those days. The payment of any money for chairing, bands of music, flags, or banners is declared illegal, but no penalty is attached; and this enactment will be inoperative. The providing of cockades and ribands being made illegal, will probably put a stop to that practice, as the riband or cockade-seller, who provides them, will be liable to the penalty. By the Standing Orders of the House of Commons, no election can be questioned later than fourteen days after the assembling of Parliament, or, during the Session, than fourteen days after the return is in the Crown Office. Yet the election auditor is not to have the bills of expenditure until three months after the day the return is declared; so that the effect of this will be effectually to prevent any charge being made against the Member, which if the bills were sooner sent in might have been the case, and the publication of an abstract of the Bill becomes a mere gratification of idle curiosity without benefit to any one but the proprietor of the newspaper in which it is advertised. The notification by the candidate to the election auditor in writing, of his agent or agents, who alone shall have authority to expend money or incur expenses on behalf of the candidate, is the most cunning device to shield the candidate and cover corruption ever propounded. A B and C D are appointed agents; their acts alone bind or affect the candidate; but the whole fry of corruption agents in every borough will work for the benefit of the candidate, who has secured himself from the penalty attaching to their acts by artful disclaimer and the immunity afforded by this enactment. The candidate is legally answerable only for the acts of A B and C D; they sanction nothing, but they know what will be done, and their ignorance is an ignorance which candidates and agents alike know well how to assume and to preserve. Such are the provisions, and such will be the effect of the new Bill for consolidation and amendment of the laws relating to bribery, treating, and undue influence. The consolidation is perfect, the amendment imperfect; but how could it be otherwise? After the Bill came from the Select Committee every attempt in the House of Commons was made to damage it and to neutralise its enactments. When Members of Parliament decline to make a declaration, 'that they have not knowingly heretofore made any illegal payments, and that they will not knowingly hereafter make any illegal payments on account of being elected to Parliament,' and strike such declaration out of the Act, they may call the Act by any name they please; but all the world knows what they intend it to prove."

He (Mr. Berkeley) asked the House to pause before they committed themselves to this measure. He submitted that he had torn the Bill to rags, and he thought it would puzzle any hon. Gentleman who supported the measure to put the tatters together. There might be good points in the Bill, but that must be a wretched measure indeed in which a decent clause could not be found. The Bill was nothing less than a snare and a delusion to the people, and mockery to legislation, and an insult to common sense. Some hon. Gentlemen had told him that it would be an advantage to get rid of bands of music, banners, and cockades. He was prepared to admit that it would be an advantage, but he remembered that a Bill to prevent the use of bands, banners, and cockades, was brought into that House some time ago by his hon. Friend the Member for Cirencester (Mr. Mullings), in conjunction with an hon. and gallant relative of his own, the Member for Cheltenham, now no more. That Bill contained clauses with reference to bands and banners, similar to those included in the present measure, but it was unceremoniously kicked out of the House; and why? The Bill to which he referred passed through several stages; but at that time the right hon. Baronet (Sir J. Graham) was First Lord of the Admiralty, and the right hon. Member for Hertford (Mr. Cowper) was a Lord of the Admiralty, and they could not then do without music and banners. The right hon. Baronet ob- jurgated the hon. Member for Cirencester and his (Mr. Berkeley's) hon. relative for endeavouring to put down the glorious pomp, pride, and panoply, of glorious elec- tions. The right hon. Baronet's taste for music was so strong that it seemed he could not go to an election without "Rule Britannia" played before him, and the right hon. Member for Hertford could not be induced to give up "The Girl he left behind Him." This Bill, however, in- cluded similar clauses to those to which the right hon. Baronet and the right hon. Gentleman formerly objected. Were they prepared now to adopt the Bill because it contained clauses which they before argued were grounds for its rejection? It might be a good thing to get rid of music and banners and cockades, but he (Mr. Berke- ley) believed that the provisions of the measure which professed to prevent cor- rupt practices and intimidation would be wholly inoperative, and he should therefore move, as an Amendment, that the House resolve itself into Committee on that day three months.

MR. CRAUFURD seconded the Motion. He said he supported the Bill on a former occasion by voting for it on several stages; but when the House rejected the declara- tion he considered the measure would be a failure, and he could no longer support it. The Bill was only carried through by a very narrow majority. If he wanted any authority to support the views he enter- tained, he need only refer to the late de- cision in the Court of Exchequer on the question of expenses. The question there raised was, that although it was proper, and within the provisions of the Bill, to furnish carriages for the electors, yet it was uncertain whether there could be a legal payment for travelling expenses; and the Court, after a most able argument, and taking time to consider their judgment, held that those expenses might be paid. It was stated by one of the learned Judges on that occasion that the Act had been inconsiderately framed, and ought to be amended. He might mention that the last election for the county of Ayr, which lasted only one day, cost more than the previous election, which lasted two days. In that case, therefore, the Act had been clearly inoperative. He also must condemn the system of placing an election auditor, like a toll-keeper, over candidates, to tax them as far as he pleased, but without being able to do them the slightest benefit. Now, he would beg to ask the noble Lord at the head of the Government whether he would, with the knowledge he possessed, press this Bill through the House? Legisla- tion of this sort was not required; it did not check expenses, but it added to the expenses those of a useless officer.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Ques- tion, in order to add the words "this House will, upon this day three months, resolve itself into the said Committee," instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. INGRAM said, he could not help expressing his great surprise that the hon. Member for Bristol (Mr. H. Berkeley) should oppose the Bill. The experience which he (Mr. Ingram) had had in the borough he had the honour to represent (Boston) convinced him that the Act was of very great use in checking expenses. He could state that at the last election for that borough not one single farthing was expended in treating, and cockades were not required; and whatever might be con- sidered necessary with regard to having bands of music in the parks on Sundays, there was but one opinion as to the im- propriety of having music at elections. He should support the Bill, because he felt certain that great benefits would be derived from its operation.

MR. TITE said, that he agreed with very much that had been said by the hon. Member for Bristol; and having had the experience of two contested elections and one Election Committee, he could only say that there was but one remedy for the evils that prevailed, and that was the remedy which the hon. Member had so often proposed, and which the House had so often rejected. Since his experience of contested elections, he had always supported the Ballot, and should continue to do so, thinking it the only means of putting a stop to the evils of contested elections and the intimidation, which did not cease with the election, but was continued by the publication of the list of voters. He held in his hand one of those famous Blue-books in which, not only the name of the voter but the amount of the rating was given—an invitation to exclusive dealing, and a mode of keeping up political irritation, which the ballot would effectually put an end to. He thought, therefore, there was but little use in passing a mere continuance Bill, as this really was, but that the Legislature should direct its attention to a remedy for the evil itself. He would admit, however, that there was some good in the Bill. It defined the character of bribery and the nature of agency: the appointment of the election auditors, and the compulsory render of accounts, was also a good measure, though clumsily carried out; he thought, too, that the expenses of the auditors were excessive, and the mode of payment, by fees, absurd. In some cases these gentlemen would pocket £50 or £60 for preliminary fees, for merely walking into a borough and then walking out. There were 912 candidates at the last general election, and forty members lost their seats; if there were the same number of candidates at the next election, they would have to pay £9,500 in the first instance. He would by no means abolish the office of election auditor—which, as he had said, he thought a very useful institution—but he thought that if the Town Clerk or the Clerk of the Peace were ex-officio the election auditor, there would be less complaint, and such a person holding a public office, for which he was responsible, would be less liable to corrupt influences. He had given notice of several Amendments, which would remedy some of the inconveniences of the existing law. Among them was one which provided that the declaration of the agents should be made before the returning officer and kept by the auditor. Again, the present state of the law as to travelling expenses was uncertain and full of peril to the candidates by a recent decision in the courts of law. The whole question turned on the mere wording of a note: that is whether in the language of the law the letter inviting the voter to come contained a condition precedent or not. If the House were not prepared to do away with such expenses, they were bound to legalise them, and that could best be done by reintroducing the clause which was expunged by the House of Lords; and he had therefore, proposed an Amendment introducing words permitting the candidate to pay, or cause to be paid, the actual and reasonable expenses of bringing voters to the poll. But the most important Amendment he proposed was, to compel the petitioner and sitting Member, on inquiry before any Select Committee of the House of Commons, to give evidence, but in such case he would take away the penalty attached to the act of bribery, and would provide that such evidence should not afterwards be used in any indictment or criminal proceeding against the parties giving it. With regard to the accusation of bribery at the last election in Bath, he believed there was no foundation for such a charge. He believed there was no bribery, and he knew that none of his money was spent in any such way. If the Bill were to be merely a continuance Bill for one year, and a promise given that a Committee would be appointed next Session, he would not propose his Amendments; but if not, he should move them in Committee.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that the present Bill was not proposed for the first time as a Bill for checking corrupt practices at elections, nor was it a Bill for rendering permanent the present law. The Government merely asked the House to continue the Bill for one year, without Amendment, the intention of the Government being to propose next Session a Committee of Inquiry into the operation of the Bill in those elections which had taken place since the measure became law. Hon. Members did not seem to be agreed as to the operation of the Act, because, while the hon. Member for Bristol (Mr. H. Berkeley) said the Act was a failure, the hon. Member for Boston (Mr. Ingram), who had had recent experience of the working of its provisions, said its operation was most beneficial. The question was one upon which other hon. Members were just as well enabled to judge as the hon. Member for Bristol. He would not express any opinion one way or the other on the subject, but it was desirable that some inquiry should take place before a Select Committee previous to the Act being either continued permanently or abandoned as a failure. [Mr. H. BERKELEY: Has the right hon. Gentleman heard Colonel Sleigh's statement?] He had not heard Colonel Sleigh's statement, but he had heard the statement made by the hon. Member for Boston. Colonel Sleigh's statement was not before the House. It might be true, but let it be submitted to a Committee, and let evidence be tendered by those who complained of the operation of the Act. If it was the opinion of the House that the Act should be continued for a year, it would be better to go into Committee on the present Bill at once, instead of getting up a desultory discussion upon the details.

MR. P. W. MARTIN said, he believed that the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act had been of great benefit to the country. He stood in that House fresh from a severely contested election, which was followed up by a petition, and he had therefore had some experience of the working of the Act. There were no open houses on either side in the city which he had the honour to represent (Rochester), and he did not believe that so much as £5 had been spent in drinking during the election in a town of 16,000 inhabitants, if there had been he was sure some of his Friends would have detected it. There had been no treating and no bribery, and he wished for the credit of the inhabitants to say that any charge to the contrary was quite unfounded. He should be glad to see an Amendment agreed to in Committee with regard to travelling expenses, since the alteration which had been proposed would make an enormous difference to the pockets of the candidates. If travelling expenses were prohibited altogether the prohibition would be nugatory, for a labouring man could not be expected to lose a day's work and spend a day's pay in coming to the poll. But if such expenses as the House agreed to allow were paid openly through the election auditor, a great improvement would be effected.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, that although the Bill could in no way prevent bribery or intimidation, it effectually prevented treating; and so far it was, no doubt, productive of considerable advantage. He very much regretted that the measure had not passed the House with that provision recommended by the Committee from which it had emanated in its original form, under which every Member would have been required before taking his seat to make a declaration that he had incurred no illegal expense at his election. Persons well acquainted with the subject had expressed their belief that that was the only proposal which had ever been made for the prevention of corruption in the return of Members to that House.

SIR SAMUEL BIGNOLD said, he thought the Bill a very useful one. Every shilling of expense he had incurred at his recent election for Norwich had been laid before the world under the provisions of that measure.

MR. H. BERKELEY said, he would not withdraw his Amendment, that the Bill be read a third time that day three months, unless he should receive a distinct assurance from the Government that they would merely make it a continuance measure, and that they would refer the whole subject to the consideration of a Select Committee early next Session.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I stated, Sir, on a former occasion, and I have not the least difficulty in repeating now, that it is the intention of the Government to refer the Bill to a Committee at the earliest period possible next Session. We are quite aware that the Bill is imperfect. We cannot, however, admit that it is a failure, but it certainly requires, and is susceptible, of amendment, and that amendment can be better made in a Select Committee than in a Committee of the whole House. I am, therefore, quite ready to give the pledge which the hon. Member requires.

MR. WALPOLE said, he thought it would be desirable to insert in the Bill an Amendment of which the hon. Baronet the Member for Shoreham (Sir C. Burrell) had given notice, under which the number of polling places would be increased among such constituencies as those of East Retford, Aylesbury, Shoreham, and other places, which extended over large portions of counties.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that such a provision would not come within the scope of the Bill now before the House.

VICE-PRESIDENT OF COMMITTEE OF COUNCIL ON EDUCATION BILL.

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR GEORGE GREY, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said it related to a subject which had been much referred to in the course of the debates on education during the last and the present Session. The Government were strongly pressed last Session to alter the constitution of the Committee of Council on Education; and instead of leaving the administration of the funds, voted by Parliament for education, in the hands of a body, constituted out of the Committee of Council, consisting of several Members of the Government, but no one of them having any of that individual responsibility which ought to attach to a Minister of the Crown, the importance was pointed out to the Government of centralising the responsibility as to administering those grants, and superintending matters of education, so far as the Government were concerned, in the hands of one Minister. It was also pressed on the Government that a representative of this department should have a seat in that House, and be ready to explain all the measures which had been taken by the Government, with the concurrence of Parliament, for the promotion of education, and should also take his share of the business which devolved upon such department. Accordingly, his noble Friend at the head of the Government announced that it was their intention to propose a Bill at the commencement of the Session for that purpose. This Bill was introduced into the House of Lords in fulfilment of that pledge, and having passed that House it now came before them for their consideration. It authorised the appointment of a Vice President, who would be enabled to have a seat in the House of Commons, and would be the responsible Minister there in all matters connected with education, so far as the Government were concerned. The Bill had been before the House a considerable time, but its passage had been delayed partly out of deference to the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Hadfield), who objected to it, and partly in consequence of pushing forward other Bills which had to go up to the House of Lords by a certain day. The only objection he had heard raised against the Bill was by that hon. Member, who was opposed to all grants whatever for education, and who thought that, by passing the Bill, Parliament would give an additional sanction to the grants which it now placed at the disposal of the Government for the purpose of extending education. But not only those grants, but the Committee of Council on Education itself had been recognised by various Acts of Parliament. He trusted, therefore, that the House would pass the Bill, which he believed would effect a most beneficial change.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. HADFIELD said, that notwithstanding the statement of the right hon. Baronet he could not approve of the Bill, and should move that it be read a second time that day three months. He found, for instance, that the new Minister was to have no jurisdiction in Ireland, where a large portion of the money voted for educational purposes was expended. The Bill was of a most extraordinary and indefinite nature, with the exception of that portion which regulated the salaries. He should like to know what the duties to be performed under it were? He must also complain that of the enormous sums voted for the purpose of education, the Church obtained by far the greater part. He thought the House would be doing an injustice to the cause of education by creating an office of this kind. When such offices were created there was no getting rid of them, except by means of an enormous compensation; and if this one were created, with a salary of £2,000 or £3,000 a year, a like demand would be made. The principle of the Bill was bad, and the measure itself had been ill-considered. It was true, as had been stated by the right hon. Baronet, that it had been introduced early in the Session, but it had never been brought on for discussion. He trusted that Her Majesty's Government, which had not brought it in on its own free will, would not lend the weight of their authority in its favour, and that it would be rejected. It would be far better to withdraw it, and come next Session prepared with a well-considered measure. For a long time the voluntary principle had prevailed, and it was only when it became a means of creating political capital that the subject was taken up by the great parties in the State, who used it merely as an instrument in their hands.

MR. PELLATT seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."

MR. INGHAM said, he regarded the Bill as a most satisfactory measure, and one which, if adopted by the House, would effectually tend to the promotion of education. Many schemes for the extension of education had been proposed, but had failed on account of the great diversity of opinion which prevailed throughout the country. He believed the best plan would be to continue the present liberal grants, and to keep both schoolmasters and scholars to their duties by a vigilant and intelligent inspection, at the same time allowing some degree of discretion to those who had the administration of the funds. At present the Committee of Privy Council, to avoid the imputation of partiality, was obliged to lay down certain rules and abide by them strictly; but if there was a representative of the Committee in that House who could explain and justify each grant, it would have a much wider discretion, and would be able to effect more good.

Question, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question," put, and agreed to.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read 2^o.

GENERAL BOARD OF HEALTH CONTINUANCE BILL.

Order for Committee read; House in Committee.

MR. MICHELL said, he felt called upon to complain of the increasing cost of this Board. At first it was only £1,300 a year, and now it had increased to between £19,000 and £20,000, besides pensions to the amount of £1,500 a year. The Board had done more harm than good, and its defective mode of laying down sewers—at Croydon, for instance—had caused more disease than it had removed.

MR. COWPER said, the General Board of Health was not responsible for laying down sewers in provincial towns. All it did was to approve the plans, and if there was any defect in the sewerage at Croydon, which the hon. Member had instanced, it was certainly not in the plans, but in their execution. As to the expenses of the Board, he would remind the hon. Gentleman of the large amount of public money saved by the application of the Public Health Act to fifteen towns, at an expense of only between £150 and £200, whereas a separate local Act would have cost them something like £1,000 each. Those towns at least were not dissatisfied with what they had thus obtained. The hon. Member had forgotten, too, that by the Act of 1848, before a town could borrow any money for public works, to be repaid in a term of years, they must have the sanction of the Board of Health. In such cases the Board had to take care that the interest of the persons who were to pay the loan hereafter should be considered, and that if the work undertaken did not promise to extend its benefits beyond a period of ten years, the repayment of the money spent should not be extended beyond that period. The amount of money which had been borrowed under the Public Health Act up to the present time amounted to no less than £2,500,000. All the works which were to be made with that money had been carefully examined by the General Board, and that was one of its functions which, while it was most important, was also one which gave great satisfaction to the local boards. Hardly a week passed without plans being sent up by local boards for the inspection of the engineer attached to the General Board, and it very frequently happened that those plans turned out utterly worthless, involving a great expenditure of money, and certain to prove failures and produce disappointment. In many instances the General Board of Health had prevented local boards from thus wasting their money, and in that way he felt certain that it was productive of much good. It should likewise be remembered that the General Board was instituted, not only to carry out the Public Health Act, but for a great number of other useful purposes, to which he need not now allude. He only hoped, however, that the friends of the sanitary cause in that House would not allow themselves to be blinded by mere prejudice against the Board of Health, but would consider how necessary it was that there should be some department of the State whose business it was to take cognisance of all those matters in which legislation or the action of Government might be usefully employed to protect the lives, to preserve the health, and to promote generally the physical well-being of the people of this country.

SIR GEORGE PECHELL said, he could not avoid expressing his disapproval of the Act of 1848, and hoped the right hon. Gentleman would give some idea of the improvements he intended to make in that measure next Session.

VISCOUNT GODERICH said, he wished to ask his right hon. Friend to give his attention to the Bill recommended by the Select Committee, which had inquired into the subject, and of which he was a Member. He believed that if such a Bill were introduced in the next Session of Parliament, it would meet with a more ready acquiescence than any other measure that could be proposed.

Bill passed through Committee; House resumed; Bill reported, without Amendment.

COUNTY COURTS ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

Order for taking the Amendments in consideration read.

MR. HENLEY said, he had understood the Bill should be recommitted, that the clauses might be considered, as they had been passed through Committee at a very late hour, and in a great hurry.

SIR JAMES GRAHAM said, that also was his opinion, but he was given to understand that after the present stage the Bill would be reprinted in its amended state.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, it would be, and that the third reading should not be taken before Tuesday at Twelve o'clock.

Clause 9.

SIR JAMES GRAHAM said, he wished to draw the attention of the Government and the Chairman of Ways and Means to this clause, to which he greatly objected. He had provided, in framing the first County Court Act, 9 & 10 Vict., that the clerk should reside in their districts. That had been found ineffective, and he had pointed out the importance of more stringent provisions for the residence of the County Court clerks in their districts. He knew of one who resided 120 miles from the district. The present clause did away with the absolute prohibition of non-residence, and he hoped that it would be withdrawn, and that the absolute prohibition would be restored.

MR. WILSON said, that the clause was only intended to meet exceptional cases, but it would be liable to abuse, and, therefore, he should not oppose its omission.

Clause struck out.

Clause 30.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he wished to call attention to this clause, which would materially affect proceedings in the superior Courts, and it also deprived plaintiffs of costs of suit in those Courts in cases where they recovered judgment by default for less than £20. That would operate prejudicially in many cases, and he should propose to insert the words, "except where the plaintiff dwells more than twenty miles from the defendant." The present law gave concurrent jurisdiction to the Superior Courts so that his proposition would only retain the law in its present state.

MR. FITZROY said, that the clause was in accordance with the principle of the County Courts Act, and was to prevent actions being brought in the superior Courts for sums under £20, except under certain circumstances. If it was a fit case for the superior Courts, the Judge would always certify for costs. A plaintiff residing more than twenty miles from a debtor, might by the present law sue him in the superior Courts.

MR. MURROUGH said, that a judgment by default could be obtained at a less expense in the Superior Courts than in the County Courts. It would cost in the Superior Courts only £2 5s., whereas in the County Courts, where the parties resided more than twenty miles apart, the expense might be ten times that amount, for the whole case must be proved. The present clause could only have been framed by some person not practically acquainted with the subject.

MR. COLLIER said, the policy of the County Courts system was to allow the suitor an option of suing in the Superior Courts where his debtor did not reside within twenty miles of him. He should support the Amendment.

MR. MONTAGU CHAMBERS said, the difficulty was this, an action might be brought, not knowing whether it would be defended or not; and it would be absurd to force the action into the County Court, which would cause far greater expense to the defendant. If the plaint were in the Westminster County Court, and the cause of action arose at Lewes, £10 expense might be caused by the necessity of bringing the witnesses to prove the case. However, if there was power for the suitor to apply to a Judge for the costs, the difficulty would be remedied. And in that case he would support the clause.

MR. ROEBUCK said it was so.

Question "That those words be there inserted," put, and negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 82.

MR. ROEBUCK said, he desired to remind hon. Members that he had called the attention of the House early in the Session to the case of Mr. Falconer, and of another Judge, who claimed the increased allowance of £1,500 a year. The hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Treasury had on that occasion stated that had that Motion not been made, those Judges would have received the increased allowance, as a Treasury Minute had then already passed. He proposed to omit certain words in the clause, which would enable those Judges to be placed in the receipt of that allowance from the date of the Treasury Minute.

MR. WILSON said, that when the hon. and learned Gentleman brought forward a Motion some months since on this subject, he (Mr. Wilson) stated that as long ago as December last the Treasury had decided that the two Judges in question were entitled, by reason of the amount of business transacted in their Courts for the last three years, to be added to the list of Judges who should receive £1,500. One of those Judges was Mr. Falconer, a relative of the hon. and learned Member; the name of the other he did not know. In the month of January, Mr. Falconer addressed the Treasury claiming to be placed in the position of a Judge receiving £1,500 a year, and was informed that a Treasury Minute granting him that salary had already been passed. About the time when the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Roebuck) brought forward his Motion a communication to that effect was made to the Home Office, and the Home Secretary replied that, inasmuch as the Lord Chancellor intended to introduce before long a measure for the general regulation of the County Courts, it would be better to defer the consideration of the question until then. The Treasury Minute, however, had been long since agreed to, and he was clearly of opinion that to those two Judges the Treasury was committed. He was bound to say, from all he had seen and heard, that a more assiduous, able, or conscientious County Court Judge than Mr. Falconer did not exist.

MARRIAGE LAW (SCOTLAND) AMENDING BILL.

Order for consideration of Amendments read.

SIR JAMES GRAHAM said, he wished to know whether the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate would have any objection to strike out from the Bill the words "usual place of residence," in reference to Scotch cases?

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he was afraid there would be a difficulty in agreeing to do so.

MR. HENLEY said, he would suggest whether those words would not create a great laxity in construction, as they might be construed to mean some sort of residence contradistinguished from actual residence.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he would take the suggested Amendment into consideration before the third reading of the Bill.

SIR JAMES GRAHAM said, he must again appeal to the House whether or not it would be advisable that a joint application ought to be made by both bride and bridegroom, which would entail no hardship, and would not be productive of inconvenience.

Bill ordered to be read a third time To-morrow.

COAST-GUARD SERVICE BILL.

House in Committee.

Clauses 1 and 2 were agreed to.

SIR GEORGE PECHELL said, that when an emergency recently occurred, and the services of the coast-guard were required for manning Her Majesty's ships, it was found that there were some 2,000 or 3,000 men employed in the coast-guard who were unfit for service afloat, and he thought the House ought to "know the reason why." It should be clearly known who were to blame for such a state of things. If the rule providing that to qualify a man for service in the coast-guard a special certificate should be required from the commander of the ship in which he had served had been adhered to, an efficient force would have been at the command of the Government. There were in the coast-guard service a number of officers who were civilians, and he should like to know what the Admiralty intended to do with them. The Bill provided for the coast-guard having the charge of the naval volunteers, an arrangement which he approved, and he trusted it would prove successful. It was matter of complaint that though the coast-guard were exceedingly useful in the protection of life and property the House should understand that was a service for which they never got promotion.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, that with reference to the civilians mentioned by the hon. and gallant Member, they would not be subjected to the discipline imposed on the sailors of the coast-guard, but would be allowed to remain as they now were. The sailors he had spoken of as too old for the service had no doubt once been good seamen, but had been too long in the coast-guard. It was intended to pay those men off with pensions, and replace them with younger men fit for any duty to which they might be called.

Clause 4.

SIR GEORGE PECHELL said, he wished to inquire if the children of the men serving in the coast-guard would be eligible to the schools at Greenwich? One of the qualifications for admission as they at present stood was, that the candidate should be the child of a mariner in either the Royal Navy or in the merchant service.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, that when the Bill passed into a law all the men employed under it would be treated as seamen of the Royal Navy, and their children would be eligible to the schools at Greenwich.

SIR GEORGE TYLER said, he would beg to ask whether the Coast Volunteers were to be kept up, or whether the coast-guard was to replace them?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, that the coast-guard were to be under the control of the Admiralty, and to be trained for service in the navy, particularly in the management of gun-boats. All coast-guard men would be entered as seamen on the Admiralty books. Some of the older coast-guard men were not so entered; and no alteration would be made in respect to them.

Clause 5.

MR. HENLEY said, he thought that the power given to the Admiralty of taking five acres of land at any point within half a mile of the coast of any navigable river for the erection of barracks for the coast-guard was too extensive. Under the existing Act power was given to take half an acre only.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he did not anticipate that there would be any material increase of coast-guard stations, or that it would be necessary to exercise the power granted by the clause. But the existing law had been found insufficient, and the consequence was that great numbers of the coast-guard were lodged in villages, where they were exposed to all sorts of temptation. What he wanted was to have power to erect stations where none existed at present.

SIR GEORGE PECHELL said, that in addition to the five acres there was power given to provide foot-paths, &c.

LORD HARRY VANE said, he did not think that sufficient explanation of the reason for those additional powers had been given.

SIR WILLIAM HEATHCOTE said, he thought that it was desirable that sufficient barrack accommodation should be provided; but he would ask the right hon. Baronet if not less than five acres would be sufficient?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, that if the Committee would pass the clause as it stood, he should reduce the number of acres to three on the third reading.

Clause agreed to; as were also the remaining clauses.

MERCANTILE LAW AMENDMENT BILL

House in Committee.

Clause 1 struck out.

Clause 2.

MR. HENLEY said, he must urge the rejection of the clause. A man might at present safely buy cattle in open market, but if the clause passed he would be liable to have his right to them disputed by any person who represented that they were stolen and claimed them as his property.

MR. LOWE said, the question had been considered by the Mercantile Law Commission, a Commission composed of many learned persons, who were of opinion that in the event of the sale of stolen property it was better, as the loss must fall on some one, that the purchaser rather than the original proprietor should suffer. The clause, however, was no insertion of his, and he had no wish to press it against the wish of the Committee.

MR. ROEBUCK said, he thought the buyer in open market ought to be protected, as he had no means of knowing that the property was stolen, whereas the proprietor might by precaution defend himself against robbery.

MR. MALINS said, he also concurred in the objections urged against the clause.

MR. LOWE said, he must confess that there was great justice in what had been stated in opposition to the clause, and as he was inclined to think that there was great advantage in affording every facility possible to dealings between man and man, he would consent to the omission of the clause.

Clause struck out.

Clauses 3, 4, and 5, agreed to.

Clause 6.

MR. MULLINGS said, he should move the omission of the clause, which provided that a guarantee to or for a firm should cease upon a change in the firm, except in special cases.

Question put, "That Clause Six stand part of the Bill."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 95; Noes 13: Majority 82.

Clause agreed to, as was also Clause 7.

Clause 8 withdrawn.

The remaining clauses were agreed to.

Order for Second Reading read.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he would now beg to move the second reading of this Bill, the object of which was to abolish an office the duties of which had become merely formal. As Tuesday next was the last day, according to the rules of the House, on which Bills could be sent up for second reading, he hoped there would be no objection to allowing the Bill to pass another stage that day, and to read it a third time and pass it to-morrow.

MR. STUART WORTLEY said, the only duties of the Cursitor Baron in recent times had been to make a ridiculous speech in introducing the Lord Mayor and Sheriffs, when a certain number of nails were counted and so many sticks were chopped, a ceremony which attracted a good many ladies to witness, but was of no earthly use. He thought some less absurd mode of introducing the sheriffs might be devised.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the Bill only provided that the duties of the Cursitor Baron should be discharged by one of the Barons of the Exchequer, or by an officer appointed by the Court, but he thought it would be in the power of the Court to make regulations for the ceremony which they thought fit.

MR. STUART WORTLEY: It may end, then, in the speech being made by one of the Ushers of the Court.

Bill read 2^o, and the Standing Orders having been suspended, it passed through Committee, and was reported without amendment.

JUDGMENTS EXECUTION BILL.

Order for Committee read; Motion made and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MR. WHITESIDE said, he should move that the Bill be committed that day three months. If the Bill passed there would be nothing to prevent a fraudulent creditor in Ireland coming over and getting a judgment here, and then sweeping away all his alleged debtor's property in Ireland, without the possibility of stopping him. He could not see why a private Member should be allowed to revolutionise the law after this fashion at his own pleasure.

MR. P. O'BRIEN said, he thought that if the principle of the Bill was good, it ought to be introduced as a Government measure. He should second the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House will, upon this day three months, resolve itself into the said Committee," instead thereof.

The House divided:—Ayes 51; Noes 39: Majority 12.

Question again proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair."

MR. WHITESIDE said, he should now move the adjournment of the debate. He had frequently stated his objections to the measure, and had not had them answered. He believed it would open the door to innumerable frauds. It was an impolitic Bill—there was no ground for pushing it at that period of the Session.

MR. NAPIER said, he was opposed to the Bill, as justice could not be done to it at the present period of the Session.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that the Bill was introduced on the 4th of February, and now the right hon. and learned Gentleman said there was not time to consider it. He would, however, recommend his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Ayr, who had charge of the Bill, to withdraw it, and to leave out Ireland when he next introduced it, as he would then have more chance of getting it passed.

MR. CRAUFURD said, he was afraid he must adopt the suggestion of the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate, and be content with the partial success which the Bill had obtained. He thought, however, he had reason to complain of the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. White-side), who led him to believe that he would support the Bill, and even agreed to put his name on the back of it. He would not on the present occasion press his Motion, but he would re-introduce it early in the ensuing Session.

Motion and Original Question, by leave, withdrawn.

Bill withdrawn.

REFORMATORY AND INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS BILL.

Order read for taking into consideration the Lords' Amendments to this Bill.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he should move that a clause which had been inserted by their Lordships, giving to magistrates power in certain cases to send juvenile criminals to a reformatory school, without the infliction of the punishment of previous imprisonment, should not be agreed to. It was incompatible with the provisions of several other clauses in the Bill.

MR. GORDON said, he must differ from the right hon. Baronet, for he regarded the Amendment in question as quite in consonance with the other provisions of the Bill; and certainly it was a clause which, sooner or later, must be enacted. He considered that it was desirable to retain a discretionary power in the hands of the magistrates to send juvenile offenders to a reformatory institution, instead of committing them to prison, which was the object of the Lords' Amendment.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, that although favourable to the clause, he thought it would not harmonise with other provisions of the Bill; and he therefore recommended that it should be withdrawn, and that this matter should be made the subject of legislation in a future Session.

MR. STUART WORTLEY said, he trusted the House would accept the Bill. He was at a loss to discover anything incompatible between the original clause and the Lords' Amendment. Cases often arose in which it was desirable that a child should be saved from the disgrace of being sent to a convict prison; and the law ought, in his opinion, to provide for such cases.

MR. HENLEY said, he must express his concurrence in the observations of the Secretary of State for the Home Department, and should support the rejection of the Lords' Amendment.

MR. ROEBUCK said, he was in favour of the Lords' Amendment. He considered the practice of sending juvenile offenders at once to prison as rather calculated to confirm than correct them in their early tendency to vicious courses.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, the clause under discussion is perfectly incompatible with the arrangements of the Bill as it now stands, and, in my opinion, that is quite a sufficient objection to the clause without entering into the merits of the case; but, I am bound to add, that when the subject was discussed some time ago, I entirely concurred in the principle upon which this clause was resisted. It is now, however, urged, that committing children to prison before sending them to reformatory institutions places them, to a certain extent, beyond the chance of reformation. If, however, this House decides upon sending children to those institutions in the first instance, I very much fear that parents will induce their children to commit offences in order to have them educated at the public expense. To avoid this I consider that they should be subjected to some short period of imprisonment before being sent to any reformatory institution. The object of the Bill is to reform criminals, not to hold out to the lower classes the temptation of getting their children educated at the expense of the country. It is objectionable in principle, because, instead of a punishment, it holds out a species of premium to crime.

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, no Member of the Government had attempted to prove that the clause was incompatible with the general purport of the Bill, but they had all contented themselves with asserting that the fact was so. The argument of the noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston), that parents might induce their children to steal that they might be admitted into these schools, was, in his belief, fallacious. The parents had an interest in getting them into prison, where they would be supported at the expense of the public; but they could not have any in forcing them into schools where they would have to contribute to their support.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that if he were not precluded by the rules of the House from again speaking on the question, he could demonstrate that the clause was incompatible with the general purpose of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question put, "That this House doth disagree with the Lords in the said Amendment."

The House divided:—Ayes 46; Noes 31: Majority 15.

Committee appointed, "to draw up Reasons to be assigned to the Lords for disagreeing with the Amendment to which this House hath disagreed:"—Sir GEORGE GREY, Mr. MASSEY, the LORD ADVOCATE, Mr. HENLEY, Mr. FITZROY, Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE, and Mr. KINNAIRD:—To withdraw immediately; Three to be the quorum.

JOINT-STOCK COMPANIES WINDING-UP ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair."

MR. WHITESIDE said, that one effect of passing the Bill might be to interfere between the Master of the Rolls in Ireland and Mr. James Sadleir, whose effects had, he understood, been seized on their way to furnish a villa at some place unknown. It was contrary to all sound principle to enact a law to meet such a case as that of the Tipperary Bank. It was his belief that it was a measure introduced for a particular purpose, and he was of opinion that it was calculated unfairly to prejudice the interests of the smaller class of farmers who had been made the victims of the unparalleled frauds of the Sadleirs in the case of the Tipperary Bank, for those men would probably know nothing of the person who was to be allowed as their representative, to dispose as he might please of their rights. He should move that the House resolve itself into a Committee on the Bill on that day three months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House will, upon this day three months, resolve itself into the said Committee" instead thereof.

MR. MALINS said, he could deny that the object of the Bill was to enable the shareholders of the bank to avoid the payment of their debts; its object was, in fact, the very reverse. The truth was, that a vast number of actions had already been commenced, and if the Bill were rejected all the assets would be swallowed up in law expenses. The carrying out of the provisions would be dependent on the Master of the Rolls in Ireland, whom the hon. and learned Gentleman had so much and so justly lauded. He regretted that the hon. and learned Gentleman had so little confidence in the tribunals of his own country. Unless he (Mr. Malins) had known that the Bill was one for the benefit of the creditors—3,000 in number—he would have had nothing to do with it. The simple object of the Bill was to enable shareholders who had property to make a surrender of it, and then to obtain a discharge.

MR. HENLEY said, although the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Malins) represented the Bill as a creditors' Bill, it was remarkable that it did not give the creditors any hold on the property of their debtors. The effect of passing the Bill would be, that the creditors would be induced to accept a small dividend, and very soon parties who had declared that they had next to nothing would hold up their heads again, and appear as well off as ever. He was strongly opposed to the measure, and he thought it most ill-judged, in the midst of a gigantic swindle, such as that which had just been perpetrated in Ireland, to step in, and by a legislative enactment, reverse the position of the parties.

The House divided:—Ayes 31; Noes 40: Majority 9.

Words added.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Bill put off for three months.

Notice taken, that Forty Members were not present; House counted; and Forty Members not being present,

The House was adjourned at a quarter before Three o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, July 18, 1856.

MINUTE.] PUBLIC BILL.—1st Income and Land Taxes; Stamp Duties; Racehorse Duty; Coast guard Service; Corrupt Practices Prevention; General Board of Health Continuance; Militia Pay; Cursitor Baron of the Exchequer; Lunatic Asylums Act Amendment.

2nd Courts of Common Law (Ireland); Unlawful Oaths (Ireland); Parochial Schools (Scotland).

8th Intestates Personal Estates; Incumbered Estates (Ireland); Metropolis Local Management Act Amendment (No. 2); Sherburn Hospital; Oxford College Estates; Prisons (Ireland); Commons Inclosure (No. 2).

STEAM-PACKET COMMUNICATION BETWEEN HOLYHEAD AND KINGSTOWN.

VISCOUNT DUNGANNON said, he was anxious that the Session should not close without some explanation from the Government on a matter which was of the greatest importance to the public. He alluded to the present state of the steam-packet communication between Holyhead and Kingstown. It was hardly necessary for him to remind their Lordships that, after the most minute inquiries on the part of practical men, it had been ascertained that the passage between Holyhead and Kingstown was the best, speediest, and safest between this country and Ireland, and that in consequence a railway had been constructed along the coast from Chester to Holyhead, crossing the Conway and Menai bridges. Yet that part of the passage which was most essential was in reality most defective. In the first place, the present steam-packets could not afford sufficient accommodation for the passengers who were perpetually passing and repassing; and, in the second, the time consumed in the passage was far greater than it need be, if steamers of proper horse power were placed upon the station. At present the passage was never under four hours and a half, even in the calmest weather, and if there was any head wind, it was often five hours and a half, and sometimes six hours. If steamers of sufficient horse power were employed, the passage could be made in three hours, and if they were 350 feet in length, there would be ample accommodation for the passengers. The noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll) might not be aware of the inconvenience to which the public was subjected, but if he had often to cross over to Ireland he would see the necessity of some change. He (Viscount Dungannon) hoped that the mere question of expense would not be considered by a great country like this. He should therefore ask his noble Friend whether there was any prospect of an arrangement being come to between Her Majesty's Government and the Steam Packet Company relative to a line of larger vessels with increased horse power.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE said, he wished to ask at what hour the mail train from London would start? The noble Duke on a former occasion had stated that it would start at half-past seven in the morning—a most inconvenient hour.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, there was a very fair prospect of a satisfactory arrangement being made with the steam-packet companies; negotiations were not yet completed, but he hoped they would come to a speedy conclusion. With regard to the remark of the noble Marquess, he would observe that it was the clear duty of the department with which he was connected to accelerate as much as possible the passage of the mails, not only to Dublin, but also to the rest of Ireland. In order to carry out that object, in order to prevent other parts of Ireland from being sacrificed to the metropolis, it was essential that the mails should arrive at Dublin in sufficient time to allow of the departure of the provincial mails as early as they were now despatched. If they were allowed to be despatched at a later hour the arrangements for the distribution of the letters in the distant parts of the country would be seriously disturbed. He did not think there was anything very unreasonable in requiring passengers to start from London for Dublin at half-past seven in the morning.

FURTHER ARCTIC EXPEDITION.

LORD WROTTESELEY said, that the noble Earl (the Earl of Ellesmere) who had given notice of the question he (Lord Wrottesley) was about to put to Her Majesty's Government, was, unfortunately, obliged to absent himself through illness, and he had delegated his task to him. He had, therefore, to inquire whether Her Majesty's Government had returned an answer to a memorial relative to a further Arctic Expedition? He trusted he might be allowed to accompany this question with some remarks explanatory of the position in which the whole matter now stood, the rather that much misconception prevailed upon the subject. The tale of Arctic search and Arctic suffering was indeed a melancholy one, and awakened so many sad and painful recollections, that he greatly feared, lest in his sympathy for the sufferers he might exaggerate the merits of the case he had undertaken to plead. He should much regret such a result, for he was well aware that in taking this course he was incurring a grave responsibility. Through eight long dreary years the relatives and friends of those gallant men who had served their country only too well anxiously awaited, and awaited in vain, some tidings of their fate. During the first part of that distressing period, they expected with each returning summer or autumn to welcome those adventurous seamen returning home in triumph from a successful enterprise, crowned with civic laurels, and about to reap the well-earned reward of their meritorious exertions. During the latter part of that period they hoped to receive some intelligence which might enlighten them as to the manner and the circumstances under which the little band of heroes had breathed their last—perhaps after much suffering removed, very far removed, from their cherished homes. Those who had experienced the misery of thus losing those who were near and dear to them in foreign lands, where the details of the calamity were necessarily imperfectly known, would remember how anxiously we desired to know all the particulars of the mournful event—the how, the when, and the where—each additional fact when learnt, added acutely to the sorrow; and yet there was a continual craving to know more and more; a thirst that could not be allayed. But in the case to which he alluded, to fill up the measure of sorrow, we had to add the agonies of suspense, since every day, every hour of each returning year might bring complete relief, or a confirmation of the worst anticipations. At last, in 1855, the crisis of the fate of these mariners arrived, and a cruel revelation was made, the particulars of which he should shortly detail:—Their Lordships were aware that, commencing with the year 1848, several expeditions, both by land and sea, were, with laudable zeal, sent out by the Admiralty, and even by our brothers on the other side of the Atlantic, to endeavour to ascertain the fate of Franklin and his companions. He would not weary their Lordships with the details of these exploits anterior to 1854; suffice it to say that, by some cruel fatality, they seemed all to have proceeded in every direction but the right one. Nothing was ascertained beyond the discovery, in 1851, of the graves on Beechy Island, the only effect of which was to send one of the best-appointed expeditions that ever left our shores in a wrong direction—to the north instead of to the south. He now came to the eventful year 1854; but before detailing the transactions of that year it was necessary, in order that their Lordships might comprehend his description of them and his comments upon them, that he should explain a few particulars relative to the configuration of the north coast of America. Three great rivers fell into the Polar Sea, flowing from the south. The Mackenzie River was that most to the west, the Coppermine River occupied the centre place, and the Great Fish, or Back River (the mouth of which was the scene of the events he was about to describe), flowing towards the north-east, occupied the most eastern position of the three. The general trending of the north coast of America was west and east, but opposite to the Coppermine River was situate, separated from the main by a narrow strait, a vast island extending through twenty degrees of longitude; similarly, opposite to the mouth of Back River, there was on the west a comparatively small island, very imperfectly explored, called King William's Land, and on the east there was a long tract of land consisting of a peninsula to the south and an island to the north. The peninsula and island were divided by a narrow strait, called after the gallant Frenchman who perished—Bellot's Strait. The peninsula was called Boothia, and the island was called North Somerset. Now, on each side of this long peninsula—and he begged their Lordships particularly to attend to this—there were two magnificent inlets or arms of the sea, running from north to south from Barrow's Strait; that to the west was called Peel Sound, and debouched on the south into Victoria Strait, at the southern extremity of which lay King William's Land and the estuary of the Back River; that to the east was called Prince Regent's Inlet, and it terminated in Boothia Gulf. In the year 1854, the Hudson's Bay Company sent Dr. Rae, one of their most intelligent and adventurous Arctic travellers to explore the west coast of Boothia Peninsula. When he arrived in Pelly Bay, which was near the bottom of Boothia Gulf, he obtained from various Esquimaux, whom he encountered there, certain particulars relative to the fate of Franklin and his companions. The story was to the effect that about 1850 a party of about forty gaunt and starving men were seen dragging a boat over the ice to the north of King William's Land; that they went down the west coast of that island, and afterwards perished near a great river. Now, had not this story been confirmed by the circumstance that these Esquimaux were in possession of various relics of the expedition, which Dr. Rae brought home, it would have been placed, as it well deserved to have been placed, on a par with various other falsehoods told by these Esquimaux during the progress of this search. Not any one of these Esquimaux who told the story had seen any of the forty men. Dr. Rae was at one time within fifty miles of the scene of the alleged catastrophe; but being, as he states, then uninformed as to the precise locality, unhappily returned home without visiting it. Neither the Government nor public were satisfied, and it was an important point in the case that they were not satisfied. Another land expedition went out in 1855 under Anderson; they descended the Back River, but they could obtain no interpreter; they were only provided with birch-bark canoes, too frail to live in the open sea; and they were supported by no ship laden with supplies and able to overawe the natives. They returned with more relics, but with no additional information of importance, except that these forty men, with a large boat, had actually arrived within the estuary of the Back River and perished there. Such was the present state of the question, and since that time the Admiralty had been in vain importuned to finish the good work they had begun. Another expedition was advocated, upon arguments which seemed unanswerable to himself and others. It was said that the clue was now found of which we had been so long in search; that the danger was now slight, because the area of research was limited to a comparatively small district, situate between the 68th and 72nd degrees of parallel of latitude, and the meridians of 95 and 100 degrees west, a region almost wholly unexplored; that even now, late as it was, a ship might be got ready by the middle of August, which might be directed to enter either Peel Sound or Prince Regent's Inlet, according as the one or the other was most free from ice; and after she had penetrated as far south as possible, walking parties might be detached from her to the scene of the catastrophe, distant probably about 400 miles (and walks of 1,200 miles had been made); or that if the approach from the west was preferred, Captain Collinson had undertaken to take a ship within 150 miles of the spot by that route. It had been shown that only forty men out of 135 had been accounted for; that as the settlements of the Esquimaux were certainly reached, as evidenced by their possession of the relics, some of the men so unaccounted for might yet be living domesticated among these tribes; that nothing had been found but a few forks and spoons and other trifles; that the boat party had not been traced back to the ships; that the ships had not been found; that they remained possibly intact, frozen up and abandoned near King William's Land; but that, even if broken up, inasmuch as, by the invariable practice of Arctic voyagers, journals and scientific records were kept carefully in tin cases, at least some portion of these might be discovered. It was a great mistake to suppose that the interests of science were in no way concerned in sending out another expedition. In the first place, the scene of the catastrophe had been scarcely at all explored; and, in the next place, it was a great object to recover the magnetical records—for magnetical observations made within the Arctic and Antarctic circles were peculiarly valuable in reference to the theory of magnetism. Now, as a very perfect set of magnetical instruments was supplied to Sir John Franklin's expedition, and they were consigned to the charge of officers of high scientific attainments, who received a special training in their use, the observations made were likely to be very valuable. Then, supposing such an expedition on other grounds to be deemed expedient, what an opportunity it offered to some of those gallant members of the naval profession who had been thrown out of employment by the peace, and were disappointed that the war had yielded such few opportunities of distinction. In conclusion, the noble Lord said that a further expedition was recommended in a temperate memorial, signed by influential and well-informed men of almost every grade and profession, and advocated by distinguished Arctic navigators, who supported their opinions by facts and reasonings which carried conviction home to the minds of men accustomed to estimate the bearings of doubtful evidence—that such an expedition would furnish employment for gallant officers; that it might lead to the recovery of lost scientific records of great value; that it might gratify the longings of attached and mourning relatives, and especially of a widowed lady who had made great sacrifices on behalf of her heroic and lamented husband; and, above all, that it would carry out to its legitimate solution an important problem in which the honour of England was largely concerned, and which had excited the curiosity and interest of the whole civilised world.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, although nothing was more natural than that such should be the strong desire of the friends of all engaged in the expedition, which reflected so much honour upon those of whom it was composed, and upon the English name, and also of persons interested in the scientific results which might be expected from the recovery of the documents supposed to have been left by that expedition, yet other considerations must be taken into account before another Arctic expedition was despatched. His right hon. Friend at the head of the Admiralty was of opinion, that, at all events, it was much too late to entertain hopes of organising an expedition this season with any chance of success. His right hon. Friend was, however, fully disposed to take into his most serious consideration in the recess whether it was desirable that any further expedition should be sent out. But he (Lord Stanley) would submit to the noble Lord whether they ought to incur the responsibility of risking the lives of brave men for such an object. As long as any hopes remained of rescuing our brave countrymen from those inhospitable regions many strong reasons might be urged for fitting out another expedition; but when the only object was the obtaining further details of the fate of these unfortunate men and some further scientific information, it was matter for grave consideration before the Government undertook such a responsibility.

THE CRIMEAN BOARD OF INQUIRY—REPORT OF THE COMMISSIONERS—ADDRESS FOR.

THE EARL OF LUCAN rose to move—That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty that She will be graciously pleased to give Directions that the Report of the Chelsea Board of Officers be laid upon the table of the House. The noble Earl said that he regretted to find himself compelled to seek from their Lordships that justice which he could not obtain from the Minister of War; but he thought it was impossible to question this fact—that it was the fixed purpose of the Minister of War not to present the Report of the Chelsea Commissioners to Parliament during the present Session. The noble Lord began to be exceedingly entertained, and he could promise the noble Lord more amusement before he concluded. He believed that the fixed purpose of the noble Lord was to withhold the Report from Parliament and from the country; and such a course of conduct appeared to him (the Earl of Lucan) to be inconsistent with common justice. Indeed, it was difficult to understand the feelings that could have prompted that determination on the part of the noble Lord, or the boldness and assurance that could support it; but unquestionably it had been in every mouth for a long time past, that it was not the intention of the noble Lord to present this Report to Parliament this Session. The answers given in that House to questions put by him (the Earl of Lucan) to the noble Lord left it without a doubt that that was his intention; and his (the Earl of Lucan's) firm belief was, that unless he could prevail upon their Lordships that night to agree to this Motion, justice would be denied to the officers of the army by the withholding the Report. To satisfy their Lordships that he was not doing an injustice to the noble Lord, he should remind them that on the previous Monday week the noble Lord stated, in answer to a question put by him (the Earl of Lucan), that he believed the Report had not at that time reached Her Majesty, and that in consequence of the illness of the Commander in Chief, it was very doubtful when it would; and that after it had been laid before Her Majesty, it would have to be considered by the Government what course they should take upon it before it could be laid upon the table of the House. However, on a subsequent occasion the noble Lord admitted that he had been misinformed—that he had since found the fact to be that the Report had been laid before Her Majesty, but that up to that time (Friday last) it still continued in Her Majesty's hands, in consequence of no printed copy of the evidence having been forwarded with the Report to Her Majesty; and that it would remain with Her Majesty till She had an opportunity of comparing it with that evidence. He hoped to hear on the present occasion from the noble Lord that the Report had reached him from Her Majesty. Now he (the Earl of Lucan) knew not what object the noble Lord had in the statement to which he had just referred, but it appeared to him (the Earl of Lucan) that that statement might lead to the inference that Her Majesty was, to some extent, a party to the injustice which the withholding of the Report inflicted upon the officers whose conduct was referred to in it; but it was well known that Her Majesty's first care was to do honour to Her army, and that she had deeply sympathised in the sufferings which they had undergone in the Crimea; and, therefore, no one could for one moment suppose that Her Majesty would be a party to the doing of an injustice to any portion of that army. He would tell the noble Lord that it was upon him, and upon him alone, that the whole injustice of withholding the Report must be laid. The noble Lord had said that it would be necessary for him to read over every word of the evidence before he could advise Her Majesty as to what steps should be taken in reference to that evidence, and to the Report which had been founded upon it. In that case there would be little chance of the Report being laid before Parliament during the present Session. But what was the course which had been taken by the noble Lord with reference to the Report of the Crimean Commissioners? Let the House for a moment contrast the noble Lord's conduct with respect to that Report with his conduct with respect to the Report now asked for. In the case of the Report of the Crimean Commissioners there was so much precipitancy and haste displayed by the noble Lord, that he found it impossible to refer that Report for the consideration of the Commander in Chief; indeed, he went farther, and said that he had scarcely allowed himself time to peruse it before he laid it before Parliament. Undoubtedly, such a Report ought to have been referred to the Commander in Chief; but such was the haste to lay it before Parliament, that that course was not taken, and though the document was only signed during the last two or three days of January, it was on the table of their Lordships' House by the 4th or 5th of February. The contrast was not favourable to the noble Lord, who now showed himself so slow in repairing injustice by presenting an exculpatory Report. The noble Lord now smiled. [Lord PANMURE: No.] But he could assure the noble Lord that he (the Earl of Lucan) knew no more about the contents of the Report than the noble Lord himself. However, this he did know—he knew every word of the evidence given before the Commissioners, and having the greatest confidence in their honour and integrity, he felt sure that the whole of the allegations made against him (the Earl of Lucan) and other officers must be stamped by the Commissioners as totally unfounded. For himself he felt little concern, because immediately after the conclusion of the evidence Colonel Tulloch came over to him, and though he had never said a word or communicated with that gallant officer before, he (Colonel Tulloch) said he thought it due to him (the Earl of Lucan) to state that had he not been misled by the evidence given him in the Crimea, by Colonel Gordon and Sir Richard Airey, he or the other Commissioner would never have said a word to his (the Earl of Lucan's) disadvantage. After such a statement as that, taken in connection with the evidence given at Chelsea, he (the Earl of Lucan), thought he was fully warranted in assuming that the Report was, so far as he was concerned, an exculpatory Report. The Minister of War excused himself on the last occasion for not producing the Report, and stated that he was acting under the advice of the Judge Advocate General. He did not desire to comment upon the manner in which that learned Gentleman conducted himself on that inquiry, or he might say that he appeared to him (the Earl of Lucan) to assume more the authority of the Board than the position of the legal adviser of the Board. What character the learned Gentleman assumed during the deliberations, with closed doors, he would not say, but he could not shut his eyes to the fact that he was a colleague of the noble Lord the Minister of War, and was, therefore, no doubt most unfairly, open to the suspicion that he might not be more impatient for the drawing up of the Report than the noble Lord was for producing it. The noble and learned Lord Chief Justice shook his head; but that did not alter the facts, and he (the Earl of Lucan) could not regard the noble and learned Lord's shake of the head as an answer to what he was putting to the House.

LORD CAMPBELL hoped the noble and gallant Earl would pardon his interruption, when he said that he (Lord Campbell) could not hear any one in a judicial situation accused without what he considered any ground, and not express his dissent from the accusation.

THE EARL OF LUCAN believed it to be repugnant to all sense of justice that, in a political inquiry a political partisan should be the officer to advise the court. A review of the proceedings at Chelsea made it clear that the administration of justice before military courts required consideration on the part of the Legislature, and, as he believed that consideration could not be given to it in a more fitting place than their Lordships' House, he hoped the next Session would not pass away without the attention of their Lordships being called to the office of the Judge Advocate General, the functions of that officer, his tenure of office, and the mode of procedure before military courts, which he did not hesitate to say was at present unnecessarily tedious and obstructive to eliciting truth. Well, the Report had, no doubt, been presented, and the evidence had been printed, for it was printed from time to time while the inquiry was being proceeded with; but something had been said about the appendix not being printed. Now, he could not understand how that could be, because some papers had been returned to him on the ground that they could not be received after the close of the inquiry, and if all the papers proposed to be printed were in the hands of the Commissioners when the inquiry terminated he could not account for the delay in printing the appendix. However, he did not think it necessary that the appendix should be printed before the Report was laid upon the table of the House, for the House had frequently received Reports and the papers which accompanied them volume by volume. On a former occasion the noble Lord the Minister of War stated that in the case of the Commission on the Convention of Cintra, the manuscript remarks made on the Report by George IV. were countersigned by Lord Castlereagh, after the Report was returned to the Government by the King, and that this was done before the document was presented to the House. Now, seeing that it had been stated that Parliament would be up in a week from this time, if the noble Lord intended to follow the precedent of the Cintra Convention Commission Report, he (the Earl of Lucan) did not think it likely that the Minister of War would produce the Report of the Chelsea Commissioners during the present Session, if the House did not express some opinion on the subject. He thought he could not be charged with any undue haste in bringing this question before Parliament. The Report had been signed fourteen days; eleven days had elapsed since it was laid before Her Majesty; this was the 18th of July; and in the course of another week, the present Session of Parliament would be brought to a close. Entertaining, therefore, as he did, the conviction that the Minister of War would not produce this Report to the House unless their Lordships expressed an opinion on the subject, he hoped he should not be considered unreasonable in calling upon the House to support his Motion. The noble Earl concluded by moving—

“That a humble address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty that She will be graciously pleased to give directions that the Report of the Chelsea Board of Officers be laid upon the table of the House.”

LORD PANMURE said, that after the speech of the noble Earl, in which he complained that it was his (Lord Panmure's) intention to withhold from him justice on this occasion, he thought that the very few facts which he (Lord Panmure) was about to state to their Lordships would show them the utter unreasonableness of the address to which they had just listened. Throughout the whole of his statement the noble Earl had told them of apprehensions which existed in his own mind, but for which, in his (Lord Panmure's) opinion, the noble Earl had given no reason whatever. Let him just trace the course of these proceedings; and let their Lordships mark the course which the noble Earl had pursued with reference to them. On the 7th July this Report was first presented to the Queen. On the 8th the noble Earl demanded to know when it would be laid before Parliament. He (Lord Panmure) said nothing on that occasion to justify the noble Earl in arriving at the conclusion that he was averse to laying the Report before Parliament. He (Lord Panmure) admitted the reasonableness of the anxiety felt by the noble Earl, for himself, and on the part of the officers whose case had been before the Commissioners at Chelsea; and all he claimed for the Government was time for the consideration of the Report before it was laid upon the table of the House. That Report was delivered to the Queen in manuscript on the 7th of July: every page of that Report referred to the proceedings which were not delivered to Her Majesty till the 9th. The 10th intervened; and late on the evening of the 11th he received that Report and those proceedings from Her Majesty, with an expressed desire that She should receive the advice of Her Cabinet on the subject. On the 12th he laid the Report before the Cabinet; the 13th was Sunday ; and the Report, which he had sent to be printed on the evening of the 12th, was delivered to him in a printed shape, occupying some thirty pages of close type, on the 15th. This was the 18th ; and during the time that had intervened between the day he received the Report and that on which he received it in its printed shape he instructed the Under Secretary of State to state, in reply to a question which was to be put in the other House of Parliament, that it would be laid upon the table as soon as possible. His colleagues and himself had between the 15th instant and the present day perused the Report. They had not yet advised Her Majesty with respect to it ; but between that day and Monday they would tender that advice to Her Majesty ; and, therefore, he could not conceive why the noble Earl had arrived at the inference that the Report was not intended to be laid upon the table before the rising of Parliament. He could assure the noble Earl that it was his intention to lay the Report upon the table on Monday, and not only the Report, but the proceedings attached to it, and the appendix, which he could not understand why the noble Earl assumed was not printed. That appendix was printed with the rest of the proceedings, which he believed had been printed and published from day to day during the inquiry. So much as to the documents. Now, with regard to the whole proceeding, it seemed to him that the noble Earl had been trying to fix upon him some intention, personally, of withholding justice from him (the Earl of Lucan) and the other officers. He could assure the House that no such intention had ever existed in his mind ; and in reply to the noble Earl's charge that the inquiry at Chelsea had been a political one, he (Lord Panmure) begged most distinctly and positively to aver that there had never been any proceeding more removed from the character of a political inquiry. That inquiry was a military-judicial inquiry, demanded by the officers themselves, and referred to officers of as high character as that of any officers in Her Majesty's service, without reference to their political opinions in the smallest degree. Nay, more, it was his conviction that if the political opinions of the Chelsea Board were inquired into, they would be found to be very much more in accordance with those of the noble Earl than with those of Her Majesty's Government. But because the Judge Advocate General, in his official capacity, was the adviser of the military Board on that occasion, the noble Earl gave that as a reason, forsooth, why that Board should assume a political hue. There was one answer for that—namely, that there was not an officer on that Board who, whatever might be the position of a public servant brought in connection with him in the discharge of judicial duties, would allow political opinions to bias him in respect to the conduct of the inquiry. The noble Earl insinuated that during the time the doors of the Board-room were closed, and while the public was excluded, the Board might have received some advice or other from his (Lord Panmure's) right hon. and learned Friend the Judge Advocate, which might have delayed the production of the Report in the first place to Her Majesty. Now, on a former occasion he (Lord Panmure) had stated that in the inquiry at Chelsea, while in most respects following the precedent of that which took place in 1808 with reference to the Convention of Cintra, in some it was deviated from, so far as allowing a fuller examination of the matters in hand, so as to assist the Commissioners in arriving at a conclusion. He found, on referring to the Report in the Cintra Convention case, that the Report was delivered to the King on the 22nd of December ; and as far as he could gather from the order made by the House of Commons for the printing of the document, it was not laid before Parliament till the 31st of January. He did not know whether Parliament had been sitting before that date, but his impression was that it had been, for in 1808 Parliament assembled at an earlier period of the year than it now usually did ; but it was clear that a very considerable delay had taken place in the delivery of the Report to the House from the time it was presented to the King. He did not, when before speaking on this subject, say that that Report was not signed by the Secretary of State ; but what he said was, that the remarks made on that Report by His Majesty were countersigned by Lord Castlereagh as Secretary for State. The noble Earl had contrasted the time which had elapsed since the Chelsea Report reached the hands of the Government with the immediate production of the Report of the Commissioners from whose statements the late inquiry had emanated. But the Report from the Commissioners sent to the Crimea was made under a very different state of circumstances. The Commissioners who were sent to the Crimea to inquire into allegations which had been made by other sources were sent by the Government; the Government announced to Parliament that they had sent them, and gave Parliament distinctly to understand that as soon as the Commissioners reported, their Report should be laid upon the tables of both Houses. He would again repeat, that, so far from there being any intention on the part of Her Majesty's Government of withholding the result of the present inquiry, it was his (Lord Panmure's) intention to have presented the Report to both Houses of Parliament on Monday next; and under those circumstances he could see no necessity whatever for the noble Earl's Motion.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, that after the assurance given by the noble Lord, his noble and gallant Friend would not of course press his Motion for an Address to the Crown for the production of the Report; and he had no doubt that had such an assurance been given to his noble and gallant Friend at an earlier period, he would not have thought it necessary to bring forward the present Motion. The language, however, of the noble Lord opposite on the two occasions upon which the subject was mentioned was, as he understood—not having been present on either of those occasions—such as to lead his noble and gallant Friend to suppose that there would be considerable delay in the production of the Report.

LORD PANMURE: I did not use any such language.

THE EARL OF DERBY could only say what he had heard was the language of the noble Lord. It was such as to leave his noble and gallant Friend under the impression that it was not the intention of the noble Lord, on the part of the Government, to bring forward the Report previous to the recess. On the first occasion to which he referred, the noble Lord had erroneously stated, as a ground for delay, that the papers had not then been presented to Her Majesty. The noble Lord, it appeared, was in error in that statement. And on the second occasion of the question being asked, the noble Lord stated that the papers were not received back from Her Majesty, and that when She did send them back it would be necessary for the Government to review them. [Lord PANMURE: No, no!] He could only say what he had heard was the nature of the language used by the noble Lord—that it was not likely the papers would be produced before the rising of Parliament; and certainly those conversations had left his noble and gallant Friend under the impression that it was not likely an opportunity would be afforded to their Lordships for a consideration of the Report before the recess. That being the case his noble and gallant Friend was naturally anxious for the production, as soon as possible, of the Report which so materially concerned himself and other gallant officers. His noble and gallant Friend was, therefore, quite justified under such circumstances in giving notice of a Motion for an Address to the Crown on the subject. But now, whether the production of the papers on Monday should be considered as the spontaneous act of the noble Lord, or the result of this Motion for an Address to the Crown, the result was such as to render a perseverance by his noble and gallant Friend in this Motion unnecessary.

EARL BEAUCHAMP bore his testimony to the impartial manner in which the whole inquiry was conducted.

LORD CAMPBELL said, that as the noble Earl had made a charge against the Judge Advocate, imputing misconduct during the investigation in question, he (Lord Campbell) thought it his duty to say that he was sure no one could have conducted himself more honourably or impartially during the trial than that distinguished functionary.

THE EARL OF LUCAN denied that he had ever made any such imputation against the Judge Advocate General. He certainly expressed an opinion on the fact of the Judge Advocate acting as adviser to the Board in a political inquiry; and he thought that it was just possible that the Judge Advocate would have shown no more anxiety in the drawing up of the Report than the noble Lord opposite had done in the presentation of it to the House.

LORD CAMPBELL said, he was of opinion that the Judge Advocate had conducted himself with the utmost possible impartiality.

INCUMBERED ESTATES (IRELAND) BILL.

Order of the Day for the Third Reading read.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE, in moving the third reading, expressed his opinion that the object of the measure was of a most useful character. As a person connected with Ireland, and aware of the difficulties which this measure had had to encounter, he wished to state that nothing could exceed the zeal, ability, and personal courage with which these Commissioners had executed the important task intrusted to them. More had been done by this new Court in six years than had been effected by the Court of Chancery during the space of half a century. One ninth part of the whole country of Ireland had changed hands without any blemish or fault in the proceedings, unless it were in one case only, where the value concerned was £25. Not less than £18,000,000 of money had been awarded, out of which sum £15,000,000 had been actually received. As an Irish proprietor he felt deeply indebted to the Commissioners for the manner in which they had discharged a great public duty.

Moved, that the Bill be now read 3^d.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE said, that he viewed the Bill with great regret. He did not deny that the law which the Bill was intended to continue had done great good to Ireland; but that was the very reason why the Court should not be continued for two years, and for two years only. Laws such as those should not be allowed to continue exceptional and temporary, but should be incorporated in the permanent legislation of the country. If this could not be done, it would be better that the law should cease altogether. There was nothing now exceptional in the state of Ireland; it was in a state of great order. It was time to arrive at a state of normal law with regard to the property of the country. It was not right that men who had not over-encumbered their estates should be placed at a disadvantage with those who had. What he could have wished would have been a different Bill—one to enable the present Court to wind up its business, which it would take only one or two years to settle, and not to allow any further petitions to be received by it. There ought to be some explanation as to the continuance for two years. He did not blame the Government in the matter—the Bill was founded on the report of Commissioners and arose from the contests of legal men, who had prevented the Government from carrying out its intention. This exceptional court ought to be suspended, and they should come to a fixed measure, not only with regard to the incumbered property, but with regard to all the property of Ireland. The Bill affected not only land but mortgages. He knew that one-third of the property bought in the Incumbered Estates Court had been paid for by borrowed money, and there were some cases in which the purchaser had not paid a single shilling, and some in which they were giving eight per cent for the money they borrowed. If this were so, it clearly defeated the object which the Bill was intended to accomplish. And there was, moreover, this consequence—that any one with an incumbered estate, who wished to raise money, could not do so, without paying enormous interest. With respect to the practice and procedure of the Court itself, he admitted that on the whole the Court and those who presided over it deserved the thanks of the public; but he could not agree in the unqualified approbation which had been expressed by the noble Marquess who had just sat down. There were not wanting instances of considerable importance to prove that the Court was not altogether faultless; while in matters of minor details there had been an irregularity and uncertainty—not to use the more popular expression, caprice—which were perhaps incidental to a Court so hastily and so imperfectly constituted, but which nevertheless were much to be regretted. The fact was that the real estates of Ireland required a permanent law and a permanent Court to deal with them, and he hoped that the Government would give an assurance that at as early a period as possible they would introduce a measure of that nature.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR concurred with his noble Friend that the principle of having an exceptional Court was extremely objectionable. On that account Her Majesty's Government, at the commencement of the Session, introduced three Bills, the great object of which was to make the Court perpetual—not confining it to incumbered estates, but giving it jurisdiction with regard to the sale of estates generally. Those Bills were introduced in the other House of Parliament, and were subsequently referred to a Select Committee. Great difference of opinion prevailed in the Committee, and the result was that they disapproved of the establishment of a permanent tribunal, mainly, he believed, because the Judges were named Vice-Chancellors, there being a vulgar prejudice against anything connected with the Court of Chancery. The Commissioners, however, reported in favour of the continuance of the Incumbered Estates Court. He confessed it would be much more satisfactory to his mind that that Court should be made a permanent institution of the country, and not be treated as an exceptional Court. He was happy to find that there was nothing in the present state of the landed property of Ireland to render any exceptional legislation of this kind justifiable. Although he could not exactly pledge himself to any particular course, he might say that the Government would be actuated by the same feelings as he had expressed, and that the matter would not escape their attention and consideration. It was, he thought, marvellous that so few errors had been committed during the progress of the transactions of the Court. There were only one or two cases in which the decisions of the Court had been called in question, and whether rightly or wrongly was yet to be ascertained. But even if the Court were wrong in those two cases, he thought that they could hardly express a greater tribute of praise to the proceedings of any court or tribunal than to say that in the course of its seven years of business, involving transactions amounting to £18,000,000, there were only one or two cases in which the decisions of that Court had been called in question. If their Lordships assented to the third reading he would suggest an Amendment, which would make the Act to expire contemporaneously with the next Session of Parliament, instead of the 28th of July.

Motion agreed to ; Bill read 3^a accordingly, and passed.

PAROCHIAL SCHOOLS (SCOTLAND) BILL.

Bill read 3^a (according to order) with the Amendments.

On Motion, That the Bill do now pass,

THE DUKE OF BUCCLEUCH called attention to the Amendments made in that Bill against the wishes of the Government, and said he was very anxious to know what the Government intended to do in relation to the clauses struck out of the Bill.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, he thought it quite possible that the other House might reinsert in the Bill the clauses which had been struck out of it at the instance of the noble Duke.

LORD CAMPBELL hoped that nothing would be done that could endanger the passing of the Bill.

VOL. CXLIII. [THIRD SERIES.]

THE EARL OF GALLOWAY said, he trusted the Government would use their influence to prevent the reinsertion of those clauses.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, he could undertake to give no pledge as to what course the Government would pursue in the other House with respect to the new clause which had been inserted by their Lordships. On a subject of the kind, there ought to have been mutual concessions. Nevertheless, he must remind their Lordships that all the concessions made had been on the part of the Government, while upon the side of the majority in that House there had positively been none. The question at issue should be settled definitively one way or another ; for certainly the subject of which the Bill treated ought not to be dealt with as a mere continuance Bill. The measure, therefore, must be left to its fate, and he would warn their Lordships that the opinions of a large proportion of the representatives of Scotland were not to be overlooked.

THE EARL OF HADDINGTON dwelt upon the hardship which would be inflicted upon the schoolmasters if this Bill were not passed. In that case they would be rendered dependent on the charity and benevolence of the heritors, and this certainly should not be the case.

LORD PANMURE supported the Bill, and stated that all Government desired was, that while they reserved the control of the schools to the parish ministers, the children of other parties besides those belonging to the Established Church should be admitted to the benefits of them.

THE DUKE OF BUCCLEUCH remarked that the Scotch Members in the other House who supported the measure were the representatives of the boroughs, in which parochial schools were not all required, while of the county Members they were as two to one against it. The subject had been taken up by the counties of Scotland at their meetings, and, with the exception of the county of Banff, they were all decidedly opposed to the present Bill. The noble Duke had stated that no concession had been made by the noble Lords opposed to the Bill ; but, for his own part, he considered that he had given way considerably. What he most objected to was the interference of the inspectors, not in the inspection of the schools, but in other respects, and he did trust that Government would seriously consider the objection.

THE MARQUESS OF BREADALBANE called upon their Lordships not to be misled by the so-called expression of opinion of the great county meetings in Scotland. These annual gatherings could always be got to pronounce against reforms of every description. Look at their conduct with reference to the reform of the constitution of the other House of Parliament. Why the county meetings were for upholding the old disgraceful system when representation was a mockery, and they were as completely opposed to the Reform of 1832 as they were to the measure now under consideration. His belief was that if the people of England and Scotland were to be debarred a proper system of national education through ecclesiastical interference and nice religious distinctions, the sooner they severed the connection between the Established Church and education the better. Why should the clergy of the country have the control of the schools? In former times it might have been different, because then the clergy alone were educated; but it was to be hoped that now-a-days others besides the clergy were equally able to administer the work of education, and the sooner the exclusive power of the clergy was got rid of the better.

VISCOUNT DUNGANNON was sorry to hear such a declaration as that which had just fallen from the noble Marquess, because it implied that the noble Marquess thought the time was come to establish a system of education in which religion was kept out of sight.

THE MARQUESS OF BREADALBANE explained that he did not say the system should be one in which religious principles were not inculcated. What he said was, that the exclusive control should be taken from the clergy.

Motion agreed to.

Bill passed, and sent to the Commons.

House adjourned to Monday next.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, July 18, 1856.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1^o Stoke Poges Hospital; Dulwich College; Dwellings for Labouring Classes (Ireland) (No. 2).

3^o Income and Land Taxes; Stamp Duties; Racehorse Duty; Coast-guard Service; Corrupt Practices Prevention; General Board of Health Continuance; Militia Pay; Cursitor Baron of the Exchequer; Lunatic Asylums Act Amendment; Marriage Law (Scotland) Amending.

INCOME AND LAND TAXES BILL.

Order for Third Reading read.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said he would beg to move that the Bill be read a third time.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he wished to know what would be the effect of the Bill on the salaries of the collectors of the income tax? There was one officer in the City of London who received not less a sum than £6,700 a year; others received £500 and upwards. He understood the intention was to secure £500 a year to those persons. He apprehended the effect of the Bill would be greatly to increase the expenditure in the shape of salaries.

MR. SPOONER said, he did not understand the meaning of one of the clauses of the Bill. It appeared to him to guarantee to those who might not receive as much as £500 a year out of the poundage a sum which should make up that amount. But what he wished to ask was, whether the same amount would be so guaranteed when the reduction of the income tax should take place?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he had not with him a list of the salaries paid to the different collectors, but, according to the best of his recollection, the salary of the collector to whom reference had been made, at present amounted to between £6,000 and £7,000. The effect of the Bill would be to reduce his salary to about £3,000, out of which sum he would have to pay certain expenses. Although he must allow that that would be a considerable salary, yet he did not think it would be an excessive one. It was not intended by the Bill to increase the salary of any person now engaged in the collection of this branch of the revenue. The provision more particularly referred to was introduced in order to prevent a vast increase of salary; but if the effect of reducing the poundage to 1d. should be to lower the salaries below £500 of those who now received a higher sum, it was certainly intended that the amount of £500 at least should be secured to those parties. In point of fact, the object of the clause was rather to prevent a reduction of salary below a certain amount than to increase it beyond that amount. With regard to the question of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Spooner) as to what would be the amount of the salaries of the collectors when a reduction of the income tax should take place, he confessed that his hon. Friend looked so far into futurity that he could hardly answer him. At the present moment the question was not one of any practical importance. But should the provision, as now drawn, not have the effect of placing the salaries of the officers on a proper scale, it would, of course, be his duty to consider whether it would not be necessary at some future time to introduce a provision to meet the exigency of the case, and prevent any undue increase of the salaries.

MR. MACKINNON said, that having paid some attention to the land-tax as an impost, he must say that, in his opinion, such a tax ought not to exist, as being levied by the Government, but that a considerable benefit would arise to the country and to private individuals if a general redemption of the land-tax were to take place under the authority of Parliament. It appeared that in April 1798, Mr. Pitt, when much straitened for money, proposed that the tax should be redeemed. The proposition was not sanctioned at the time by the House of Commons, but in the present day such a measure would, he thought, be both beneficial to the country and satisfactory to individuals. Now, he would ask what was the present state of the case? The land-tax produced a revenue of about £1,400,000 out of which £33,000 was deducted for collection. If sold, say at twenty-four years' purchase, the income tax, at 1s. 4d. in the pound, would be saved. If the proprietors were allowed the preference for the first six months, and after that period the public were allowed to purchase, many benefits would arise, and he could not see any loss or any inconvenience to either the Government or the public. A reduction of £24,000,000 might be made in the national debt if the tax was redeemed, and secure investment for trustees of settled property would be laid open to the public. At the present season of the year, and at the close of the Session, it was scarcely necessary to enter into the subject, but he hoped that early next Session the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer would allow the appointment of a Committee of the House to enter into a full consideration of it.

COLONEL FRENCH said, it was his opinion that the Bill had been brought in for the purpose of giving relief to persons in Scotland who were at present charged with the payment of the land-tax; and he thought that similar relief ought to be extended to Ireland, especially as the poor rates were exclusively borne by the occupiers of land in that country.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the hon. and gallant Gentleman laboured under a mistake. The effect of the Bill was not to impose a tax on the landlords, nor was the relief it afforded exclusively given to the landholders of Scotland, but the same privileges would be enjoyed by the landholders of Ireland.

Bill read 3^o, and passed.

RACEHORSE DUTY BILL.

Order for Third Reading read.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in answer to a question by Mr. W. LOCKHART, said, that the present law imposed a duty of £3 17s. upon all horses kept or used for races; and the Judges had expressly decided that the case of yeomanry horses, though only hunters, if used as racers, in yeomanry races for instance, did come strictly within the purview of the existing law. It was, however, the practice of the Revenue Department not to charge the duty on those horses, or on any horses which were not properly speaking racehorses.

Bill read 3^o, and passed.

COAST-GUARD SERVICE BILL.

Order for Third Reading read.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he should be glad to know what would be the amount of increased expense incurred by the Bill?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he had already stated that when the whole system contemplated by the Government should be brought into full operation a very considerable increase of expense would be incurred. The formation of a large naval reserve was a most important national object, and the country must be prepared to bear a great expense to accomplish that object. But during the present year he did not expect that any large expense would be incurred. In future the coast-guard service would be a purely maritime service, and the Vote for wages and other expenses would be taken by the Admiralty, but for the present year the sum which had already been voted for the Customs would be sufficient to pay as many men as he could expect to raise before next year.

Bill read 3^o, and passed.

CURSITOR BARON OF THE EXCHEQUER BILL.

Order for Third Reading read.

Bill read 3^o.

MR. STUART WORTLEY said, that considerable inconvenience would be experienced if one of the Barons of the Exchequer had to come up to town to be present when the sheriffs were sworn in, a duty till now discharged by the Cursitor Baron. He begged, therefore, to move an Amendment in order to enable the Barons to direct how that duty should be performed.

Amendment agreed to.

GOOD-CONDUCT PAY OF SERGEANTS— QUESTION.

MR. PELLATT said, he wished to ask the hon. Under Secretary for War whether it was the intention of the Government to grant to the sergeants of the army, while serving, the good-conduct pay which they were in possession of at the time of their promotion to the rank of sergeant?

MR. FREDERICK PEEL said, that the War Department were disposed to allow sergeants to receive, while serving, the good-conduct pay which they had previously earned, and a correspondence had taken place on the subject between the War Department and the Horse Guards. There were difficulties in the way, but the matter was under consideration.

SITE OF SMITHFIELD MARKET— QUESTION.

MR. KER SEYMER said, he would beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, whether it was the intention of the Government to give effect to the first recommendation of the Smithfield Site Committee, namely—

“That the best appropriation, for the general benefit, of so much of the site of Smithfield as reverts to the Crown, would be to adopt it for the enjoyment and recreation of the public”?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that at present no final decision had been come to by the Government with respect to the recommendation referred to. The Government was certainly disposed to give effect to the recommendation; but before coming to a final decision with respect to it they would have to confer with the Corporation of the City on the subject; for though the Government believed that the site formerly used as a cattle-market at Smithfield, to a certain extent, became re-vested in the Crown on the abolition of the market, yet it would be necessary to communicate with the Corporation of London before coming to a final decision.

Mr. Stuart Wortley

THE REVIEW AT ALDERSHOT— QUESTION.

MR. GRANVILLE VERNON said, he would beg to ask the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for War whether he would have any objection to furnish a Return of the expense incurred in conveying Members of both Houses of Parliament on Wednesday last by railway to Farnborough station, and providing refreshment for them at Aldershot; and also a Return of the number of tickets issued for that occasion by the War Department, so that by an easy arithmetical calculation any Member who wished to pay his own expenses might ascertain what they were?

MR. FREDERICK PEEL said, there would be no objection to grant the Return. The whole expense had been very small, not, he believed, exceeding £260.

THE LAND TRANSPORT CORPS— QUESTION.

MR. MONTAGU CHAMBERS said, he wished to ask the hon. Under Secretary for War whether the same gratuity awarded to the men of the Army Works Corps, on their discharge from the service, would be given to the artificers of the Land Transport Corps?

MR. FREDERICK PEEL said, the two corps stood on a different footing. The Army Works Corps had been engaged under a special arrangement, with a promise that they should receive this gratuity, but the Land Transport Corps were enlisted like all other ranks in the army, were attested, and received a bounty.

THE BRAZILIAN SLAVE TRADE— QUESTION.

MR. BRAMLEY-MOORE said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he had any objection to lay on the table of the House copies of the recent correspondence on the subject of the slave trade, between Her Majesty's Minister, Mr. Jerningham, and the Government of Brazil; and also copies of any correspondence on the same subject between the Brazilian Minister and the British Government?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, there would be no objection to lay the papers on the table. That part of the correspondence which had taken place before March would be given in the ordinary course in the papers relating to the slave trade for the present year, and the remainder in the papers for next year; but there would be no objection to give it in a complete form as far as it had at present gone, according to the hon. Member's desire.

SOUTH WALES HIGHWAY ACT— QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE TYLER said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, whether, in consequence of the several memorials presented to him from highway districts in Glamorganshire, pointing out various difficulties those boards had to contend with in carrying out the provisions of the South Wales Highway Act, and praying the same might be amended, it was the intention of the Government, either in this Session or the commencement of the next, to introduce any measure for the purpose of rendering the South Wales Highway Act more just and efficient?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that the Act affected several counties, but, as only one had complained of its operation, the Government had not thought it necessary to consider the expediency of introducing a measure to amend it.

THE DULWICH COLLEGE BILL— QUESTION.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE said, he wished to ask whether the Government intended to proceed with this Bill, which had only that morning come down from the Lords. He believed that it would meet with considerable opposition in that House, and it was too late to refer it to a Select Committee. The Bill stood for second reading on Monday next. Now, there was a strong objection to the Bill, and it would be strenuously opposed; therefore, considering the uncertain position in which it stood, he thought it would be better for the Government to withdraw it at once, and so remove the suspense of those who were opposed to it.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he was not aware that any serious objection was intended to the Bill, but if there were any such intention it would, perhaps, be better not to proceed with the Bill during the present Session. He would communicate on the subject with his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, who had charge of the Bill as one of the Charity Commissioners. The present Bill was one of a number which had been laid before Parliament for the purpose of carrying into effect a scheme provisionally approved of by the Charity Commissioners. He thought that there was no serious objection to the principle of the Bill, although there might be some matters of detail open to opposition. It had passed through the Lords, where it had been considered in a Select Committee. However, if any serious opposition should arise, the Bill, partaking somewhat of a private nature, would have to go to a Select Committee, and, of course, under those circumstances, there would be no time to get it through Parliament this Session.

MERCHANT SEAMEN—QUESTION.

MR. RIDLEY said, he wished to ask the Vice President of the Board of Trade, whether it was contemplated to introduce next Session any measure for establishing, under proper organisation, a new fund for the relief of aged and disabled seamen of the merchant service who were not entitled to relief from the fund to which the Act 14 & 15 Vict. c. 102, applies?

MR. LOWE replied, that the Board of Trade had no intention to introduce any such measure.

THE GERMAN LEGION—QUESTION.

SIR JAMES FERGUSON said, that it had been reported that a serious affray had taken place at Aldershot, between the soldiers of the German Legion and some British regiments, and he wished to ask the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for War whether this had been the case, and whether the disturbance had been attended with loss of life; and, also, whether the regiments of the German Legion were intended to remain much longer quartered with British troops?

MR. FREDERICK PEEL said, that he had received no intelligence of such an affray. The German Legion would not occupy their present quarters much longer.

BANK FRAUDS—QUESTION.

MR. ROEBUCK said, he would beg to ask the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland whether he intends to propose any Amendment of the criminal law to meet the defects pointed out by him in relation to the Tipperary Bank case.

MR. J. D. FITZGERALD replied, that the Tipperary Bank case having disclosed the existence of a very great defect in the criminal law, owing to which more frauds might pass unpunished, it was his intention early next Session to introduce a full and complete measure which would, he hoped, meet all cases of fraudulent appropriation of the property of others.

THE FOREIGN LEGION—QUESTION.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON moved that the House at its rising should adjourn until Monday.

COLONEL GILPIN said, he would avail himself of the opportunity which the Motion afforded of calling attention to the long time the Foreign Legion had been kept in this country. At the time the Foreign Enlistment Bill was passed, it was distinctly understood that the men enlisted under it would only be brought here for the purpose of being trained, and the second clause of the Bill contained an enactment to that effect; and yet how stood the fact? Why, a short while ago a portion of the German Legion was sent to perform duty in Plymouth garrison. He should have thought that the Government would have seized the earliest opportunity to disband these troops, and to apply their horses to the use of our cavalry regiments, who so much wanted them. It was quite humiliating to see those foreigners well mounted and our own troopers absolutely marching before their Sovereign without horses. The matter was one of so much importance that he was sure he should be excused for asking the hon. Gentleman, the Under Secretary for War, what really were the intentions of the Government with respect to the foreign troops?

COLONEL NORTH said, he would also take the opportunity of asking the hon. Gentleman (Mr. F. Peel) whether there was any truth in the report that officers who had not served in the army three years and were about to be reduced would only receive a gratuity, instead of half-pay. He admitted that under the warrant of October, 1854, the War Office had power to make such an arrangement, but he would submit that the services of those young officers, among whom there were forty or fifty captains, had been such as fully to entitle them to their half-pay.

SIR DE LACY EVANS said, he rose to inquire what requital was intended to be made by Her Majesty's Government for the services of the chaplains in the army? He would likewise take that opportunity of expressing his opinion that some information should be given as to what was to be done with the Foreign Legion. It was originally promised that those troops should remain in England only to be trained for warlike operations. Some months had now elapsed since the conclusion of the war, but no preparations appeared to have been made to fulfil this promise by disbanding the legion. No estimate of the probable or the actual expense of the foreign troops had as yet been laid before the House, but he had himself made some calculations on the subject, from which it was to be inferred that these 14,000 or 15,000 foreigners would cost the country between £800,000 and £900,000 more than British troops. True, the House had granted to the Government the means of raising about 50,000 militia which were not embodied, and 40,000 troops of the line, which, though they were much needed the Government had not had the ingenuity to raise, and it was possible that the money voted for such purposes might now be available for the payment of those foreigners; but he considered that some statement ought to be made upon the subject before the termination of the Session. He begged to ask the First Minister of the Crown what were the intentions of the Government as to the retaining or disbanding of these troops?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, I must, in the first place, respectfully enter my protest against the practice that has been growing up of late in this House of hon. Members getting up and asking the Government what is their intention upon this, that, and the other matter. No doubt there may be subjects of sufficient importance to justify prospective inquiry, but I apprehend that, speaking generally, the position of the responsible advisers of the Crown in Parliament is to be responsible for what they do, and that they are not called upon to take this House into their counsels in regard to what they are going to do on every small matter. In reply therefore to the hon. and gallant Member for Westminster, I beg to observe that what we are going to do with respect to the disposal of the German Legion, will, I trust, when done, be found perfectly consistent with law and propriety. More than this I am not prepared to say.

MR. ROEBUCK: I beg, Sir, to call the attention of the noble Lord to this significant fact, that when we ask what the Government are about to do we are met with the objection that we are too early, and when we venture to inquire what they have done we are told that we are too late.

ACTING ASSISTANT ARMY SURGEONS— QUESTION.

MAJOR REED said, he wished to put a question to the hon. Under Secretary for War, respecting the dismissal of the acting assisting surgeons of the army. He had received numerous communications from those gentlemen complaining that they were about to be dismissed with two months' pay, while the surgeons in the Turkish Contingent and other corps were to receive twelve months' pay. Inducements had been held out to those gentlemen at the beginning of the war to enter the army; they had laboured with the greatest skill and diligence—sometimes under the guns of the enemy—dressing the wounds of the soldiers; and now they were to be sent to the right-about with a miserable gratuity of two months' pay. One gentleman stated that he had been at above £150 expense, and had only received £79 as pay. They were about to present a memorial to Lord Panmure, in which they stated that they had given up a comfortable position and their private practice, and had volunteered to go to any part of the world. Mr. O'Callaghan, a gentleman who had received the thanks of the commanding general, stated that he had regularly taken his turn in the trenches at the siege of Sebastopol, and had been the means of saving several lives at the attack on the Redan.

MR. FREDERICK PEEL said, that after what had fallen from his noble Friend at the head of the Government, he need only refer to the questions respecting the reduced officers in the army, and the acting assistant surgeons. With regard to the reduced officers, the regulation in force was that no officer was entitled to full and permanent half-pay unless he had served three years upon full pay. If the officer was not brought again upon full pay, and chose to sever himself from the prospect of being so, he might receive from the Treasury the price he had paid for his commission. As to the acting assistant surgeons, it was distinctly explained to them, that in the event of their not being brought into the list of regular surgeons they would not be entitled to half-pay, and would be discharged with two months' pay. It was on this account that a rate of pay had been given them higher than they would otherwise have been entitled to. He believed it was raised from 10s. to 11s. a day. He could not hold out any promise that it would be in the power of the Government to alter the terms that had been proposed.

LOSS OF HER MAJESTY'S SHIP "BIRKENHEAD"—QUESTION.

MR. GORDON said, that not seeing the First Lord of the Treasury in his place, he would beg to ask the right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for the Home Department, whether Her Majesty's Government would take into consideration the propriety of erecting, in the chapel of Chelsea Hospital, or elsewhere, some permanent memorial of the gallant and self-devoted conduct of the officers and men lost in Her Majesty's ship Birkenhead on the 25th day of February, 1852. He might be asked why he raised such a question at a period so long after the event to which it referred. His answer was, that it was not an unfitting time for us, now that the war was happily terminated and we all evinced our gratitude to the army which fought and suffered for us in the Crimea, to recognise services which, though of a peaceful character, were universally admitted to be as brilliant and distinguished as any recorded in our country's annals. The circumstances connected with the loss of the Birkenhead must be so fresh in the memory of all that it would be unnecessary for him to make any but the most passing allusion to them. The Birkenhead, a large troop-ship, was employed in carrying to the Cape of Good Hope the draughts of various regiments to the number of 600 men, under the command of Lieutenant Colonel Seaton, and she sailed from Queenstown in the month of January, 1852. She arrived at Cape Town at the end of February, and left shortly afterwards for Algoa Bay. On the 25th of February the disaster occurred which called forth that display of gallantry and self-devotion to which he wished briefly to advert. There were on board the Birkenhead, when the melancholy catastrophe occurred, in addition to the soldiers, a number of women and children and sick persons. What he wished to call attention to was the calm heroism, the stern adherence to duty, the magnanimous disregard of life shown by those brave men, while the vessel was going to pieces under their feet. The only boats available were filled with the women and children, and sent off from the ship's side; so that the officers and soldiers, remaining on deck, deliberately deprived themselves of their only means of safety, and, calm and motionless, awaited the sinking of the vessel. Their noble conduct was well described by Captain Wright, one of the survivors, who, in a private letter, said that all the officers received their orders and had them carried out as if the men were embarking, instead of going to the bottom: that, indeed, he never saw an embarkation conducted with such an absence of noise and confusion; that there was not a single cry or murmur from any of the men; that just before the final plunge, a suggestion having been made that all who could swim should jump overboard and join the boats, the officers begged them not to do so, because the boats were filled with women and children, and must inevitably be swamped if their living freight were increased, when the men replied by a cheer, and only three of them attempted to reach the boats. This act of cool heroism, which had been estimated at its full value, not in this country alone but abroad, and had done much to sustain, and even to raise, the high character of our army for unflinching discipline, was beyond all praise. This result was in a great measure due to the efforts of Colonel Seaton, who was certainly no ordinary man, and whose rare talent for gaining the affections of the soldiers under his command and moulding them to his will had trained these men, most of whom were young and untried levies, to face danger and death with unshaken fortitude. An equal meed was due to all the other officers and men present on this trying occasion. The youngest officer of the regiment, to whom life was full of hope and promise, trod the deck by the side of his commander with as firm a step, and looked upon the ghastly horrors of death with as much bravery and composure as those who had been longest inured to peril. He (Mr. Gordon) assuredly did not think it too late to mark the country's sense of the discipline and heroism of men who had thus calmly sacrificed their lives to save others, and he therefore begged to put the question of which he had given notice.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that every one acquainted with the circumstances just described by his hon. Friend must fully concur in the feeling tribute which he had paid to the gallant and devoted band of British officers and men who lost their lives on the melancholy occasion of the wreck of the Birkenhead. That act of noble daring, performed by men who were not inspired by the incentives or surrounded with the glory and excitement of the battlefield, but under circumstances in which there were no approving eyes to see them, deserved an equal measure of admiration and gratitude with the brightest achievements in our military history. With those sentiments Her Majesty's Government were certainly prepared to take into consideration the propriety of erecting some permanent memorial to commemorate the magnanimity and adherence to duty of those brave men.

DANUBIAN PRINCIPALITIES—QUESTION.

MR. OTWAY said, that, some years ago, several gentlemen of high character belonging to the Danubian Principalities were banished from their native country without having been previously brought before any tribunal, or condemned for any offence. If they had really been guilty of any crime, it was one in which this country had largely participated—namely, opposition to the protectorate proposed to be exercised over the Principalities by Russia. The case of these persons was laid before the Conferences at Paris, and, as a Commissioner had been appointed for the Principalities, he (Mr. Otway) wished to know whether the Government would give instructions to that Gentleman with the view of ameliorating the condition of those individuals and enabling them to return to their own country? To enable the noble Lord (the First Minister) to answer this question, if so disposed, he begged to move, as an Amendment to the Motion before them, that the House, at its rising, adjourn till to-morrow.

MR. SPEAKER said, that such an Amendment was irregular.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he was prepared to answer the hon. Gentleman's question. The case of those natives of Moldavia and Wallachia had been brought under the notice of the Congress at Paris. It was still under the consideration of the Government, who hoped that an arrangement would be made by which the parties would be enabled to return to their own country.

THE BANK CHARTER—QUESTION.

MR. TITE asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether it was his intention to institute an inquiry, by way of Committee or otherwise, in the next Session of Parliament, into the commercial, monetary, and financial operation of the Charter of the Bank of England, and of the departments of banking and issue respectively, under the provisions of the Act 7 & 8 Vict. c. 42? It would be in the recollection of the House that early in the Session, the hon. Member for Kendal (Mr. Glyn) had asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether it was the intention of the Government to institute any inquiry before a Committee of that House, or otherwise, into the working and effect of the Act?—and that the reply of the right hon. Gentleman was, that if there should be a general wish for such an inquiry the Government would not oppose it; but that at the same time, under the extraordinary and exceptional state of things caused by the war, that would not be a favourable moment for an examination into the affairs of the Bank. In another place it had, however, been recently stated that it was not the intention of Her Majesty's Government to propose to the House any Motion for the appointment of such a Committee. It appeared, therefore, that the Government were contented with the present state of things, and apprehensions were consequently entertained in the commercial world that no inquiry would be instituted into the operation of the Bank Charter Act which was passed in 1844. According to the provisions of that Act, the Bank Charter might be revoked after the 1st of August, 1855, upon twelve months' notice being given by the Speaker after a Vote of the House, and he thought it most undesirable that a body like the Bank of England should be placed in a position of such uncertainty. In 1847, the Bank was subjected to a severe pressure, and Committees were appointed to inquire into the matter without, however, coming to any result; and it appeared that since 1844 the fluctuations in the value of money had been greater than they were between 1819 and 1844? and from 1844 to the present time there had been no less than forty-four different rates of discount. Such a state of things was very inconvenient to the commercial community, and it was desirable to ascertain whether it was attributable to the Bank Charter Act or to other causes. He would, therefore, now put to the Chancellor of the Exchequer the question of which he had given notice.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said that in the early part of the session when a similar question was put to him, by the hon. Member for Kendal, he stated that as the country was at that time engaged in hostilities, and as various financial and pecuniary operations were in progress of an extraordinary and exceptional nature, it was not a convenient moment for instituting any inquiry. Later in the Session the same question was again put to him, and his answer was, that, looking to the period of the Session and the extent of the inquiry which a subject of this nature would necessitate—that it was not his intention to propose the appointment of a Committee; but that, if any hon. Gentleman moved the appointment of such a Committee, and the proposal received the support of the House, the Government would not feel it to be their duty to oppose the appointment. No such Motion had been made, and accordingly the Session was approaching an end without any Committee having been appointed. The hon. Gentleman now asked whether it was the intention of the Government to move, at the beginning or early in the next Session, for the appointment of a Committee to inquire into the Bank Charter Act. The only answer it was in his power to give was that the question was one which the Government had not yet considered with reference to the proceedings to be taken next Session, and that consequently they had come to no decision upon the subject.

Motion for the adjournment of the House was then agreed to.

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY BILL.

Order of the Day for considering the Lords' Amendments to this Bill, read.

MR. BOUVERIE said, he proposed to move that the House should agree to the whole of the Amendments. The first four Amendments had reference to various provisions in the Bill respecting the constitution of the electoral body of the University, the powers of the Commissioners, and the right of voting in the University. Those Amendments were comparatively unimportant, and the only important Amendment was one in the 44th clause, which really consisted in the restoration of the words of the clause as it stood when the Bill was originally introduced by him into that House. The clause originally proposed to give to persons who were not Members of the Church of England, and who had hitherto been excluded from taking degrees, the right of taking degrees and all consequent privileges, with the exception of votes in the Senate of the University. The hon. Member for North Lancashire (Mr. Heywood) proposed an Amendment, which was adopted, and which conferred upon persons who were not members of the Church of England, not merely the right of taking degrees, but of voting in the Senate, and so enjoying a share in the government of the University. The other House by a very large majority, exceeding two to one, had struck out that Amendment, or rather had restored the clause to the form in which it originally stood. He did not think there was any reasonable probability that the House of Lords would agree to any modification of the clause, and he would therefore propose that the House should agree to the Lords' Amendment, which, he believed, was the most that could be got. He must say, looking to the feeling which had often been exhibited on this subject in the other House, that he thought the Lords had made great concessions of opinion in agreeing to the clause as it at present stood, and he hoped that House would be disposed to meet them in the same spirit. On those grounds he should, therefore, move, that the House do agree to the Lords' Amendments.

MR. HEYWOOD said, he had an Amendment to propose, the object of which was to meet certain objections made against the clause as it stood originally. His Amendment was to give Dissenters, and other persons not members of the Church of England, the same powers as were possessed by members of the Church of England; and the main point was with regard to the public interests of the body, to open the Senate to them all. While his object was to give to Dissenters the right of admission to the Senate, he was quite willing that when the subject of theology was brought forward, only those persons should take a part in the proceedings who declared themselves members of the Church of England. He regretted the course which the Lords had taken on the Bill, as the ameliorations he asked for were in entire accordance with our national policy. The unsuccessful working of the Oxford University Act afforded one very strong reason why they should not in the present instance agree to the Lords' Amendments. It was supposed, when that Bill was passed, that the University would adopt a more modern and liberal system than before; but, so far from that, bigotry and intolerance had swelled at Oxford to a degree far higher than they had ever done in the days of the old oligarchy. The same ecclesiastical spirit reigned in Cambridge, and they might consequently expect the same results. The constituent body in Cambridge did not exceed 200 gentlemen, of whom 150 were clergymen of the Church of England, and even of the fifty remaining probably one-half intended to take holy orders, so that not more than twenty of the number could be regarded as laymen. With such a constituent body they could have no difficulty in guessing what would be the system of government in the University. He therefore contended that it was humiliating to Dissenters to allow them to take degrees without sharing in the rights and privileges which those degrees ought to impart. No harm could accrue either to the Church or the State by the admission of Dissenters to the Senate, especially when he provided that they should take no part in theological examinations. Dissenters would be allowed to take the degree of B.A. or M.A., but with regard to any power, or emolument, or office, they would all be closed against them. He (Mr. Heywood), by his Amendment, wished to make the Bill one of religious liberty; whereas, as it stood, it was only one of toleration. There was, however, a much larger question for consideration, namely, the system of education pursued in the University, and he believed the introduction of new blood would be a great improvement. He would conclude by moving the Amendment upon the Lords' Amendments, of which he had given notice—namely, after the words "entitle him to," to leave out "be or to become a member of the Senate," and insert, "take any part in those proceedings of the Senate which direct the course of study, and determine the books prescribed for the examinations in Church of England theology."

MR. BOUVERIE said, there was one practice in the University of Cambridge which he thought they might imitate with advantage on the present occasion, as well as on many others—namely, not to deliberate, but merely to vote. The hon. Member for North Lancashire did not now propose to give Dissenters votes for all purposes; but, being pressed with the difficulty of allowing them to take a share in directing the theological studies of the University, he wished to make them piebald members of the Senate, having votes for one purpose but none for another. Now, of the three proposals which had been made, that was decidedly the worst:

and, believing that three-quarters of a loaf was better than no bread, he hoped the House would agree to the Lords' Amendments.

MR. T. CHAMBERS said, he thought the proposal of the hon. Member for North Lancashire was a fair compromise, and not open to very serious objection.

CIVIL SERVICE SUPERANNUATION FUND.

Order for Committee read.

MR. WALPOLE said, he would appeal to the Government not to proceed with the Bill. The evidence taken before the Committee to which the subject had been referred, and the Resolutions at which they had arrived, had not yet been laid before the House ; and, under those circumstances, considering that the Bill affected the interests of a large number of public servants, it would hardly be right to proceed with the Bill during the present Session.

MR. STAFFORD said, he hoped the Government would withdraw the Bill. It was not of so pressing a nature that it could not stand over until the next Session, and he believed that those who were affected by it would prefer that course. He would, therefore, appeal to the noble Lord opposite, who had so often conceded the point of not proceeding with Bills at that late period of the Session to withdraw the Bill for the present.

COLONEL NORTH said, he also thought that the best course which the Government could take would be to withdraw the Bill.

MR. ROBERT PALMER said, as a Member of the Committee, he must appeal to the Government to withdraw the Bill. The civil servants, he was afraid, would be more dissatisfied with the Bill than they were with the existing state of things. It certainly was not pressing, and could be left till next Session without inconvenience.

MR. T. CHAMBERS said, he should also support the proposal for the withdrawal of the Bill.

MR. ROEBUCK said, he could not see what other course was left to the Government but to withdraw the Bill, as the evidence and the Report of the Committee were not before the House. If the subject was worth being sent to a Committee, it was worth being well considered, but at present the House was positively not in a position to pronounce an opinion upon the question.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that early in the Session he had obtained leave to introduce a Bill upon the subject of Superannuation in the Civil Service, and he had upon that occasion made a statement of the existing state of the law upon that subject. The Bill had, with the consent of the House, been referred to a Select Committee, which had received full powers not only to consider that measure, but also to investigate the entire system of superannuation in the civil service, it having been previously known to the House that great complaints had been made by members of the civil service in reference to that system. Those complaints had been principally directed against that provision in the existing law under which annual deductions were made from the salaries of all persons who had entered the civil service since the year 1829, those deductions being considered to be made with reference to the right of those persons to obtain a superannuation on the conditions prescribed by the Act. The Committee entered very fully into the investigation of that subject, and they had ultimately come to a conclusion upon it at variance with the principle on which the Bill as originally introduced was founded. They agreed to recommend the abolition of the annual deductions, but they at the same time recommended that the salaries of the existing civil service should be revised, with a view to reduce them to an amount corresponding with the annual abatements. There were, besides, some further alterations in the Bill, partly affecting the scale of remuneration, and partly affecting other subjects, so that the measure, as it came out of the Committee, differed in some very material respects from the measure as it had been proposed by him at the commencement of the Session. He felt fully the justice of the appeal made to him by many Members, that it would not be fair to the House to enter into a consideration of that question before they were put in possession of the very detailed evidence which had been taken before the Committee with respect to various parts of the subject, and more especially with respect to the question of the annual abatements from the salaries. He readily admitted that that subject materially affected not only the feelings of the members of the civil service, but also the efficiency of that service; because that efficiency would naturally be impaired by the prevalence of discontent among those members. He, therefore, felt that it would be improper on his part to force the consideration of the Bill at that moment on the House; and he thought it desirable that its discussion should be postponed till a future occasion. He should, however, observe, that as he had been aware that the Bill in its altered shape was by no means acceptable to many members of the civil service, he had thought it his duty, considering the extent to which it had been changed by the Committee, to lay it before the House in order that the House might have an opportunity, if it should be thought proper, of considering its provisions. He had felt himself called upon to act in some measure as the organ of the Committee which had altered the Bill; but as it appeared to be the wish of the House that the measure should not be proceeded with at present, he would at once consent to its withdrawal, and he should conclude by moving that the Order for its committal be discharged.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD said, he thought the right hon. Gentleman misunderstood one important recommendation of the Committee. The right hon. Gentleman said, the Committee had recommended that the salaries of the civil servants should be revised with a view to their reduction by an amount corresponding with the annual abatements. That was not, however, as he (Mr. S. Fitzgerald) understood the recommendation of the Committee. They had only recommended that the salaries should be revised, because they had not thought it desirable that the civil servants should at one swoop be made a present of some £70,000 or £80,000 a year. The Select Committee wished to have the salaries revised, but to have them revised with a due regard to the fair claims of the members of the service. The Bill had no doubt been altered in the Committee, but the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer seemed to have varied in his views upon the subject, and it was only by his casting vote that the Committee had agreed to change one of the provisions in the right hon. Gentleman's own measure.

SIR FRANCIS BARING said, that a difference of opinion between the Members of the Committee on such an important point was sufficient proof of the propriety of withdrawing the Bill. He wished, however, to make one suggestion to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. His right hon. Friend was aware that the question, whether the deductions did not amount to a great deal more than was commensurate with the advantages given to the civil servants, had been before the Committee over and over again, and had been referred by them to two eminent actuaries. Those gentlemen stated they had not sufficient materials for a decision, and in consequence of the view taken by the Committee they were directed not to proceed with their calculations. He would suggest, therefore, that as the Bill was postponed, those Gentlemen should prosecute their inquiry, and get at the truth of the question. The civil servants would then see how far their complaints were well founded.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he begged to express his concurrence in the course taken by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in withdrawing the Bill; if they proceeded without having the evidence and Report before them, the Bill would appear to be the Report of the Committee, which it was not. He hoped measures would be taken as soon as possible to relieve the civil servants from the agitation and uncertainty in which they were placed in regard to a question of so much importance to them.

VISCOUNT MONCK said, he wished to say a word as to the decision of the Committee with regard to the annual deduction. The Member of the Committee who proposed the Resolution was decidedly of opinion that all the salaries should be reduced in proportion to the abatement, but he had used the words "revised, with a view to reduction," in order to enable the Government to deal with any case of particular hardship that might arise.

LEASES AND SALES OF SETTLED ESTATES BILL.

House in Committee.

Clauses agreed to.

MR. HADFIELD said, he wished to propose, after Clause 19, the following clause :—

“ The Court shall be at liberty to grant any application under this Act in any case where the applicant, or any party entitled, has previously applied to either House of Parliament for a Private Act to effect the same or a similar object, and has not obtained such Act.”

His object was to prevent the decisions of Parliament from being overruled by the Court of Chancery.

Clause brought up, and read 1^o.

MR. MALINS said, he hoped the Committee would reject the clause, because it sought to exclude one individual from the benefits which the measure would confer on all the rest of Her Majesty's subjects. The object of the advocates of the clause—although they had not the manliness to avow it—was to restrict Sir Thomas Maryon Wilson in regard to his Hampstead estate; and the words proposed would reach that gentleman, and that gentleman only, quite as effectually as though they had specified him by name. The circumstance that Sir Thomas Wilson had applied for a Private Act and been refused it was seized upon as a means of fixing him, a proceeding no less arbitrary or capricious than if they had hit upon that gentleman's stature, and declared that no man of that particular height should enjoy the advantages of the Bill. The covert design of the clause was, no doubt, to protect the public against the enclosure of Hampstead Heath—a thing, if possible, to be avoided; but, if the heath was common land, it could not be enclosed; and if it were private property, which it was desirable should be kept as it is for the use of the inhabitants of the metropolis, let the public purchase it. Certainly, nothing could be more unjust than that Sir Thomas Wilson, merely because he had an estate in a very agreeable situation, should be deprived of the power over it which all other owners of land were to be permitted to exercise. The Bill, although one of the very highest importance, had passed rapidly through the House, because its benefits were to be extended without distinction to all Her Majesty's subjects; and why, at the last moment, was the discussion to be embittered and the impartiality of the measure blemished, by the invidious exclusion of one individual from its benefits? The property belonging to Sir Thomas Wilson was not built upon, because, by the will of his father, he had not the power of granting leases; and when he applied to Parliament to confer that privilege upon him, it was denied by reason of a prejudice respecting the enclosure of Hampstead Heath. That privilege would be extended to him in common with every other proprietor by the provisions of the Bill, unless the very objectionable clause of the hon. Member for Sheffield was carried. It was a delusion to suppose that the proposition of the hon. Member would protect the public. Sir Thomas Wilson was not a very young man; he was the tenant for life, and, in the course of nature, would soon be succeeded by the tenant in tail, who could easily obtain the fee simple, and then snap his fingers at their endeavour to prevent him from granting leases.

LORD ROBERT GROSVENOR said, the Lord Chancellor had no objection to the clause. The noble and learned Lord had said, his objection was not to its principle—

THE CHAIRMAN said, he must remind the noble Lord, that the course he was taking was irregular.

LORD ROBERT GROSVENOR said he could, at all events state, that the opinion of the Lord Chancellor was in favour of the clause in principle.

MR. MALINS said, he rose to order. Surely it could not be regular thus to appeal to the opinions of noble Lords with respect to a Bill under discussion.

LORD ROBERT GROSVENOR said, he thought there was no danger of that House being brought into collision with the House of Lords by the adoption of the clause, for he was able to state that not only the Lord Chancellor, but Lord Campbell and Lord Brougham were in favour of the clause. The Earl of Derby had likewise stated, that he did not consider this the case of a Private Bill at all. He believed, therefore, that if the clause were sent up to the House of Lords they would be willing to accept it. The hon. and learned Member for Wallingford (Mr. Malins) seemed to imagine that his (Lord R. Grosvenor's) constituents wished to inflict an injury upon Sir Thomas Wilson by obtaining his property for less than it was really worth, but he could assure the hon. and learned Gentleman that they were desirous of paying its fair value. Arrangements were now in progress which he (Lord R. Grosvenor) hoped might lead to the purchase of the property upon just and equitable terms. All his constituents objected to was, that the House should, by passing a retrospective measure, give a fictitious value to the property in question. He, therefore, hoped the hon. and learned Solicitor General would assent to the adoption of the clause. As regards the principle of the clause, it could not possibly be impeached, for surely the Court of Chancery ought not to be permitted to reverse the decision of Parliament.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, that, when a similar measure to the one now under discussion was introduced last Session, he was informed that strong opposition would be offered to it because it would afford facilities to Sir Thomas Wilson to accomplish objects which he had previously been unable to attain. He (the Solicitor General) was, however, enabled to allay the apprehensions which were felt upon the subject, and he stated then, as he would state now, that, while he entertained the strongest objection to the introduction of any clause in a public Bill which amounted to a privilegium in the case of a particular individual, he knew no reason why any particular individual should be exempted from the operation of such a measure. He stated, also, that if the House of Commons approved the principle that propositions which Parliament had deliberated upon and rejected should not be reviewed by a court of justice, that principle should be embodied in the Bill, and that any Member who supported such a principle ought to be able honestly, candidly, and sincerely, to pledge himself that he believed the principle a just one, and that he did not advocate the introduction of the clause with the view of accomplishing any remote or sinister object. The notion that the Bill would give Sir Thomas Wilson the opportunity of doing what he had hitherto been unable to do was altogether idle and unfounded. Hampstead Heath would not be in any danger if the Bill were passed; but, if Sir Thomas Wilson had any private property adjoining the Heath which he could not now lease for building purposes, he would be enabled by the Bill to apply to the Court of Chancery for power to grant such leases. Why should the fact of Hampstead Heath being adjacent to Sir Thomas Wilson's property deprive him of that right? There might be many other cases in which applications had been made to Parliament, and such applications had been referred to the Judges; for, when a Private Estate Bill was proposed, it was generally referred to the Judges for their opinion, and if the Judges had reported against such applications, and they had afterwards been rejected by Parliament, he thought it reasonable that the question should not be re-opened. If hon. Members were of that opinion, then they might vote for the insertion of the clause; but, unless they could conscientiously say that they supported it on that ground, the clause ought not to form part of the Bill. In any case he thought the clause could not stand as it was proposed by the hon. Member for Sheffield, because it simply rested on the fact of a Bill having been brought in, and not obtained. The clause, if inserted at all, ought, instead of the words, "has not obtained such Act," to read thus, "and such application has been rejected on its merits, or has been awarded against by the Judges to whom the Bill may have been referred." He hoped, however, the hon. Member for Sheffield would not persevere in the clause. He did not believe the Court of Chancery would ever grant an application that had already been adjudicated on by Parliament through the medium of a reference to the Judges.

MR. WIGRAM said, he thought that, if the provisions of the Bill were correct, they should not be swayed by the circumstance that they might possibly affect the case of a particular individual. The object of the Bill was to substitute applications to the Court of Chancery for applications to Parliament, and, though he approved generally of the Bill, he knew the difficulties with which such applications to the Court of Chancery were beset—difficulties which rendered it almost impossible for the Judge to come to a sound judgment regarding them. He would, therefore, vote for the clause, should the hon. Gentleman press it to a division.

MR. MALINS said, the question was brought to a very narrow issue. The House of Lords had given up their privileges, and consented to vest them in the Court of Chancery, and the point was, would the House of Commons do the same?

MR. WARNER said, he considered the Bill as a measure attacking private property. It was an attempt, aided by a newspaper cry, to obtain Sir Thomas Wilson's property with or without his consent.

MR. HENLEY said, his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Malins) did not say one word as to the general effect of the clause, but argued it solely on the ground of its application to a gentleman whose name had been drawn into the debate. Everybody, however, knew that the application of the clause would be much wider. Those Estates Bills were always rejected by the House of Lords, and the clause would apply to any such case. If he thought it could affect some one individual only the clause would not have his support, but it was a general clause, as the hon. and learned Solicitor General had clearly shown to the Committee. If it caused inconvenience to A or B, it could not be helped. It had been whispered about, though it could not of course be true, that the Bill would never have been heard of had it not been for the rejection of a private Bill. Such things were said, but no one of course could believe it. He hoped the clause, as amended by the hon. and learned Solicitor General, would be assented to by the Committee.

SIR WILLIAM HEATHCOTE said, he was satisfied with the statement of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General—that there would be no danger of the Court of Chancery, within a short time, granting an application which had been refused by Parliament. It was a monstrous proposition to maintain that, because a person had at any time in his life applied to Parliament for a private Bill, and been refused, therefore he should for ever afterwards be precluded from applying to the Court of Chancery, under a general Act, although circumstances might have entirely changed. Such a limitation, if adopted, might in many cases defeat the object of the Bill. If any doubt were entertained as to whether the Court of Chancery would or would not, immediately after the passing of the Bill, reverse any decision to which Parliament had already come, then, no doubt, a restriction as to time might be introduced; but if the hon. and learned Solicitor General felt confident, as he had professed himself to be, that no application under the same circumstances would be granted in one place which had been refused in another, there could be no good reason for adopting the clause.

MR. BARROW said, he must maintain, notwithstanding what had been said on the other side of the House, that in dealing with this question they could proceed upon general principles. He knew nothing of the individual to whom allusion had been made, nor, so far as he was aware, had he ever been on Hampstead Heath, unless, indeed, he had passed it on the top of a mail-coach many years ago. He therefore felt no personal interest in the matter one way or the other, but, upon general principles, he held that Parliament had a right to lay it down as a rule that, having itself already refused an application for a private Settled Estate Bill, no inferior authority should be at liberty to reverse its decision. Circumstances could not possibly vary, for the circumstances upon which Parliament had decided in any given case were those in which the property had been settled; but, supposing that a change of circumstances did take place, to whom should a renewed application be made? Surely to the persons who had decided in the first instance. They were the parties to whom the alleged change of circumstances should be submitted, in order that they might have an opportunity, if they thought fit, of altering their decision. Upon those grounds he was prepared to vote for the clause.

MR. NAPIER said, that the arguments which had been advanced in favour of the clause, if sound, would, in his opinion, be fatal to the principle of the Bill. But he was not aware that any person who had applied to Parliament for a private Bill and been refused was thereby debarred from making a second application. Where Parliament had refused it would be proper, generally speaking, for the Court of Chancery to object also; but, if it were right to empower that Court to deal with one case, why should it be prevented from deciding in all? He regarded the Bill as one of great importance. It was to extend to Ireland; and in that country he knew many properties which could not be used with advantage on account of the limited leasing powers. He should certainly vote against the proposed clause.

MR. HADFIELD said, he thought that the Amendment proposed by the hon. and learned Solicitor General would be a great improvement to the clause, and he would, therefore, be willing to adopt it.

MR. WIGRAM said, he would suggest that the hon. Member should also add to his clause:—"And where no material alteration in the circumstances under which such Bill was refused has since occurred."

MR. HEADLAM said, that the more he listened to the discussion the stronger became his objections to the clause. If they could not trust the Court of Chancery, they ought not to pass the Bill.

SIR DENHAM NORREYS said, he did not believe there was a single Gentleman in the House, with the exception, perhaps, of the hon. Member for South Nottinghamshire (Mr. Barrow), who was so simple-minded as not to see that the real object of the clause was to deprive one individual of the right of using his property as he pleased. They wished to preserve Hampstead Heath, but were in reality preventing Sir Thomas Wilson from using another property at least a mile from the Heath.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the clause be now read a second time."

The Committee divided: — Ayes 84; Noes 42: Majority 42.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, he wished to move a clause to the following effect—

"That the Court of Chancery shall not be at liberty to grant any application which a Committee of the House has rejected or reported against."

MR. NAPIER said, he wished to propose an Amendment upon the hon. and learned Solicitor General's clause, namely, after the word "rejected," to add, "on its merits."

Clause agreed to.

MR. HADFIELD moved the addition of the following clause—

"Before making any application to the Court under this Act, the party intending to apply shall give notice of such intended application, by advertisement in the London Gazette, three calendar months before making such application, and by advertisement to be inserted once every week during such three months in a London daily paper, and also in a country paper circulating in the county where the estate is situated, and by printed handbills posted on the most usual and conspicuous places in the same county; and any person or body corporate, whether interested in the estate or not, may apply to the Court of Chancery, by Motion for leave to be heard in opposition to any such application, and the Court is hereby authorised to permit such person or corporation to appear and be heard in opposition to any such application, on such terms and in such manner as it shall think fit."

The clause, with certain verbal Amendments, agreed to.

The House resumed.

Bill reported, as amended.

VICE PRESIDENT OF COMMITTEE OF COUNCIL ON EDUCATION BILL.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

Clause 1.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he proposed to fill up the blank left for the salary of the Vice President with the sum of £2,000. The Vice President would be a Member of the Privy Council, and by analogy with other offices it was thought that the salary ought to be £2,000 a year.

MR. HENLEY said, he thought that, under the circumstances, the salary was enormous. When the Bill was brought in the Government had an Education Bill in the other House of Parliament, and there was an extensive scheme in that House proposed by a noble Lord the Member for London (Lord J. Russell) which, if carried out, would have required constant supervision of extensive machinery at headquarters. That large scheme and the smaller scheme of the other House had equally miscarried, and he did not consider that there was any occasion to set up an expensive Minister who would only have to discharge a moderate amount of duty.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he must defend the proposal, on the ground of the amount of duty which the Vice President would have to perform; for the office, if it were to be properly filled, would require a person of some official experience holding the rank of a Privy Councillor, who, having a seat in that House, would be able to give any information that might be required on the subject of education. Having regard also to the amount of other salaries, he did not see how a lower amount could be proposed.

MR. HENLEY said, he wished to guard himself against expressing any opinion as to the amount of salary. He directed his observations against any salary being paid at all. At that late period of the Session, when so many Members had left town, there was no opportunity of discussing such an important subject in a full House. The Bill had been for many months on the paper, and there did not seem now to be so much prospect of the national system being adopted as there was eighteen months ago. As no inconvenience would result in the recess, he should prefer to have the subject stand over.

MR. HADFIELD said, he would like to take the sense of the Committee upon the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman. He would, therefore, move that the Chairman report progress; and if he did not succeed in that, he should subsequently move that the salary be reduced to £1,000. The sum of £2,000 a year was enormous when they considered that a County Court Judge would only receive £1,500.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Being aware, Sir, of the sentiments entertained by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Sheffield (Mr. Hadfield) on matters of this sort, I feel that the course which he now proposes to adopt is in perfect conformity with his opinions. The Committee, however, ought to recollect that, although this measure has been proposed by Her Majesty's Government, yet it has been pressed on them by parties on both sides of the House. Indeed, I know of nothing on which there has been a greater degree of consent than the advantages of appointing some person who would be responsible for the education of the country, and I, therefore, hope that the Committee will not by its vote sanction any attempt to defeat the Bill, as it would be entirely at variance with what has been understood to be the strong opinion of hon. Members on both sides of the House as expressed not only during the present Session, but also last year, when they urged on the Government how important it was that there should be in this House some official person responsible for the education of the country, and ready to give the House every necessary explanation in reference to it. With regard to the time, the hour was not so late but that those hon. Members who had objections to the measure might have ample opportunities of stating those objections.

MR. HEYWOOD said, he was aware of the enormous quantity of work which devolved upon the President of the Council and the Secretary of the Education Committee, and believed there would be ample employment for the new officer whom it was proposed to appoint. He also thought the appointment of a lay Vice President, to represent in that House the secular view, would be an advantage as tending to diminish the ecclesiastical supremacy which at present pressed upon the cause of education. The Oxford Commission would expire in a year, and it was desirable to have some authority to attend to the proceedings of that University.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he quite agreed in what had been said by his right hon. Friend (Mr. Henley), and should oppose the measure. He should very much dread the introduction of political bias into the management of the education of the youth of the country. He did not think that a Vice President selected, as such an officer would be, from the Government members, would have sufficient weight in the Council to prevent rash changes in the education system. There could be no greater misfortune than the introduction of political bias into the Committee of Council; it would be most detrimental to education; and, believing that the Bill would lead to such calamitous results he should vote against it.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that the Committee of Council of Education consisted exclusively of members of the Government for the time being; and the object of the present Bill was merely to individualise the duties, and make one person responsible to that House for the execution of those duties.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he could not imagine a stronger objection to the measure than that afforded by the fact that it would so individualise the responsibility. The vesting of the responsibility to one person holding particular opinions was pregnant with danger to the educational system, particularly in its connection with the Church.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he thought it would be much more convenient to have one recognised member of the Committee of Council in that House to act as a Minister of Education. The Secretary of State for the Home Department could not make himself sufficiently acquainted with the details of educational matters to give satisfactory answers to the questions of hon. Members on those subjects. He, however, thought that a salary of £1,500 a year would be sufficient for the Vice President.

Motion made and Question put, "That the Chairman do report progress and ask leave to sit again."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 30; Noes 91: Majority 61.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That the blank be filled with £2,000."

MR. THORNELLY said, he should move that the salary be £1,200 only. He did not think that it ought to be greater than the salaries of such officers as County Court Judges.

MR. HADFIELD said, that the Bill was an ill-judged one. The duties of the Vice President were also ill-defined, and they were taking a leap in the dark. He thought that £1,200 was quite sufficient.

MR. MOWBRAY said, he would suggest that the salary should be £1,500.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, it was very desirable that the office should be held by a person of official experience, and for that reason it had been thought requisite to name £2,000. The Bill, however, did not fix the salary at that amount, but merely laid it down as a maximum, which was not to be exceeded. The salary would come every year under the revision of Parliament.

MR. CHEETHAM said, he thought that as the creation of the office was an experiment £1,200 was well enough to begin with.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD said, the office was one of the highest importance, and it would not, in his opinion, be judicious to name a salary which would make it unworthy of the acceptance of any person holding the rank of a Privy Councillor.

SIR WILLIAM JOLLIFFE said, though he was opposed to proceeding with the Bill at so late a period of the Session, he was not willing to reduce the salary so low as to make it unlikely that it would be accepted by a person of high position and experience.

MR. SERJEANT SHEE said, he thought that £2,000 a year was not a shilling too much.

MR. E. BALL said, that until they had arrived at some clear idea of what was to be the national system of education which they were to adopt, it would be unwise in his opinion to appoint an officer with so large a salary.

MR. VERNON SMITH said, that the Government had almost pledged itself last Session that a Minister of Education should be appointed. Under all the educational schemes proposed, such a Minister was considered essential. He would point out the advantages to the country and the Committee of the appointment of a President of the Poor Law Board. At one time, all poor-law questions were answered by the Secretary of State. The salary was fixed by the case itself, as no Privy Councillor holding office had a salary of less than £2,000 a year. The case of the office of Judge of the County Courts was not applicable, as that office was a permanent one.

MR. HENLEY said, that it was accidental that the President of the Council happened not to be in that House, otherwise he would be the person to answer educational questions. As he did not know what the duties of the proposed officer would be he could not determine what the salary ought to be, and should vote against all salary. There was no complaint of the way in which the work was done at present.

Question put, "That the blank be filled with £2,000."

Sir George Grey

The Committee divided:—Ayes 78: Noes 47; Majority 31.

MR. HADFIELD said, he wished to propose the following proviso—

"Provided always that the duties of the said Vice President shall extend to the superintendence of grants of money for educational purposes in all parts of the United Kingdom and the application thereof, and the reporting of the benefits which may from time to time result therefrom."

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he must oppose the proviso, which, if carried, would create an unnecessary interference with the Irish educational system, admirably managed already.

Proviso negatived.

CHARITIES BILL.

House in Committee.

Clause 1.

MR. MOWBRAY said, he should move the substitution of July for September. In 1853, the House had been promised that the Roman Catholic charities should be only temporarily exempted from the operation of the Act, but that promise had not hitherto been redeemed. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Baines) had, however, pledged himself to introduce a measure of this kind next Session, and the object of the Amendment was, that the right hon. Gentleman might redeem his pledge early next Session, when there would be a full attendance of Members.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 1. to leave out the word "September," and insert the word "July" instead thereof.

MR. BAINES said, he could not accede to the proposal. The House had determined in favour of a Continuance Bill, but he had never heard of one extending only over ten months. How could he answer for any delays which might take place in carrying the Bill through this and the other House next Session? Yet if it had not received the Royal Assent by the 1st of July, all those charities would, from that time, if the hon. Gentleman's Amendment passed, be completely unprotected.

MR. WIGRAM said, he was of opinion that the Bill ought to be general, and that all exemptions were objectionable. He was persuaded that the popular feeling would be strongly opposed to the continued exclusion of Roman Catholic charities from the operation of the measure.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that it had been admitted on the previous day, by the hon. Members for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) and North Warwickshire (Mr. Spooner) that there were special circumstances affecting Roman Catholic trusts which would render it undesirable that they should be included in the Bill in its present form. After the pledge which had been given by his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster to bring in, early next Session, a Bill which should include Roman Catholic charities, he trusted that no objection would be made to the continuance of the present Bill for another year.

MR. MOWBRAY said, he would adduce the case of the Crime and Outrage (Ireland) Act as a precedent for the continuance of an Act of Parliament for a shorter period than one year.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, that the special reason for continuing that Act for ten months was, that Irish Members who wished to discuss it could not be present at the end of the Session. There was no such reason for continuing the measure before the House for ten months instead of a year.

MR. HEADLAM said, he should support the Amendment on the ground that it was objectionable to continue partial legislation upon the subject, and that the Government had given a pledge to introduce a general measure. Having, in his capacity of Chairman of the Mortmain Committee, examined into the circumstances of many of the Roman Catholic charities, he believed that there was no reason whatever for their exemption, and that they would not suffer from being subjected to the Board as it was now constituted.

MR. HENLEY said, that there was nothing magical in twelve months any more than ten, and, as the present Bill was a measure which would require a good deal of legal discussion, it would be desirable to bring it on before learned Gentlemen went on circuit, which they did early in July.

MR. BAINES said, he could only repeat that he would bring in a general measure upon the subject early in the next Session, and he hoped that there would be ample opportunities of discussing it before July. That he had promised to do, and he had no doubt that he should be able to fulfil his promise; but he wished to avoid involving himself in a pledge that the Bill should pass before July.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he was clearly of opinion that the duration of the Bill should be limited to next July.

MR. KINNAIRD said, he should support the Amendment, because he had a distinct recollection that the noble Lord the Member for the City of London pledged himself, when the Bill was first introduced, that within two years he would bring in another measure to meet the case of the Roman Catholic charities.

Question put, "That the word 'September' stand part of the clause."

The Committee divided: — Ayes 58; Noes 46: Majority 12.

House resumed.

Bill reported without Amendment.

JOINT-STOCK BANKS BILL—ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [24th April], "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair."

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

MR. VANCE said, he should move that the Bill be committed that day three months. The Bill proposed to do away with a security granted to shareholders by the Banking Act of 1844, which required that a change should take place in the direction of banks from time to time. That provision of the law had worked no inconvenience in the case of the banks of England or Ireland; on the contrary, it had proved a great safeguard in both instances. The Act of Sir Robert Peel did not compel directors to retire by rotation, for the old and experienced directors might remain, while the younger ones could retire. The hon. Baronet opposite (Sir J. Shelley), however, the framer of the Bill, would alter that, and allow all the directors to retain their seats year after year—there were, in fact, to be no retirements at all. Having seen the disasters to which banks were exposed under the management of self-elected directors in the case of the Tipperary Bank, and also in that of a Yorkshire bank with which he was acquainted, he should call upon the House not to permit such a dangerous innovation, but to let the law remain as it was.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House will, upon this day three months, resolve itself into the said Committee," instead thereof.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, he would only observe that the Bill was not intended to do away with the system of the directors retiring, the only change which it would effect was to render those who retired re-eligible, which the existing law did not allow.

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question," put, and agreed to.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill considered in Committee.

House resumed.

DWELLINGS FOR THE LABOURING CLASSES (IRELAND) (No. 2) BILL.

SIR WILLIAM SOMERVILLE said, he rose to ask for leave to introduce a Bill to extend the Act to facilitate the improvement of landed property in Ireland, and the Acts amending the same, to the erection of improved dwellings for the labouring classes in Ireland. His object in introducing the Bill at that advanced stage of the Session was, that its merits might be canvassed during the recess.

Motion agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Sir WILLIAM SOMERVILLE and Mr. GEORGE ALEXANDER HAMILTON.

Bill read 1^o; to be read 2^o on this day three months.

REGISTRATION OF TITLE DEEDS—QUESTION.

LORD LYNTHURST said, he had a question to put to his noble and learned Friend on the woolsack in reference to the registration of title deeds. Two or three years ago a Bill was introduced by his noble and learned Friend for the registration of title deeds. It was referred to a Select Committee, and afterwards came down to their Lordships' House, where it was passed by a large majority, and then sent down to the other House. What subsequently became of it he did not know, except that it had not passed into law. It appeared, however, that a Commission had been subsequently appointed to inquire into the subject; and the questions he wished to ask his noble and learned Friend were—first, whether that Commission had made a Report?—secondly, if not, what was the reason of the delay?—and, thirdly, whether there was any probability of a Report being made? He could not sit down without expressing in the strongest terms his regret, that various important measures which had been introduced into the other House of Parliament, and various other important measures which had been sent down from their Lordships House, had, during the present Session, been either lost or abandoned. He never recollected, in any Session, so wholesale a destruction of measures.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, the answer to the first question was, that the Commission had not made a Report. That Commission was appointed under the following circumstances. The Registration of Titles Bill passed that House with very general, though not universal, concurrence, but it did not get a very favourable reception in the other House; it was referred to a Select Committee, who reported against it, but thought that a different plan for the registration of titles would be expedient, and recommended that a Royal Commission should be appointed to consider the whole subject. The consequence was, that in the following year—1854—a Commission was appointed to look into the subject; as he had already stated, they had not yet made their Report. With regard to the probability of their reporting, he might state that he had communicated privately with the Solicitor General and others who were on the Commission, and they assured him that the Commission was looking very attentively into the subject; but that they found, as he confessed he had anticipated, a great deal more difficulty in devising some tangible plan than they at first imagined. He believed, however, that they would make a Report, and he understood also that they had embodied the plans which they recommended in the shape of a Bill, which would be laid on the table of the House. He had himself prepared the heads of a Bill for a very modified registration, but he was stopped at an early period of the Session from introducing it, by the intimation that the Report of the Commission suggesting a more extended scheme would shortly be laid before Parliament; and, unless he got that Report during the recess, he should unquestionably introduce the smaller measure. With regard to the remark of the noble and learned Lord respecting the withdrawal of Bills, he shared in the regret he had expressed as to the abandonment of several important measures; but, at the same time, he was prepared to show that a considerable number of very useful ones had been passed in the course of the Session.

THE RAJAH OF COORG—QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE wished to put a question to the Government with respect to the treatment of the Rajah of Coorg by the East India Company. The Rajah was a prisoner of State at Benares, and some time ago he applied to the Company for leave to come to England chiefly for the purpose of superintending the education of his daughter, whom he wished to be brought up as a Christian. He obtained leave of absence for one year; at the expiration of that period he applied for an extension of leave, but it was positively refused by the Company, and as he did not return they stopped that portion of his allowance which he received in this country, the rest being applied to the support of his relatives at Benares. A more tyrannical and unjust proceeding could not well be imagined. The Rajah's medical advisers had told him that this country was more healthy for him than India; but the East India Company had sent their physician to examine him, and he said there would be no danger in his returning to India by a sea voyage, at a certain time of the year. One very important fact was, that the Rajah was prosecuting a suit against the East India Company in the Court of Chancery, and that they were demanding his return to India at the very time when his presence in this country was of the utmost importance. He (the Marquess of Clanricarde) could scarcely believe that the Government knew anything of these circumstances. He wished to ask the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll) what were the reasons of the Company for insisting on this nobleman's return to India, and why they had withheld the allowance which they had contracted to give him while in this country?

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, the noble Marquess seemed better informed upon the details of the Rajah's case than he was, for he had not seen any of the papers, and was only acquainted with the general state of the facts. He believed that the Board of Control had no power whatever to compel the East India Company to pay the allowance which they had withheld from the Rajah. The noble Marquess had stated the facts correctly, and by his statement that the Rajah was a State prisoner, he implied that the Company had power to require the return to India of this prince, who was considered in that country to be a prisoner at war. The Company could either have given or withheld leave of absence, and therefore it was not an act of tyranny on their part to refuse to allow him to remain in England beyond the period which had been specified. He understood the local Government of India considered it was objectionable that native princes should remain permanently in England, expending here the revenues which were given to them by the East India Company. The noble Marquess had insinuated that the object of the Company in demanding the Rajah's return to India was to impede the suit which he was carrying on against them; but he could not conceive that they were actuated by any such reason. It was perfectly obvious that by the employment of lawyers he could prosecute that suit as well in India as in England.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH rose to confirm the accuracy of the noble Duke's statement, that the Board of Control had no power whatever to compel the Court of Directors to pay the Prince the sum they agreed to give him during the year he had leave of absence. The noble Marquess had stated the facts of the case correctly, and he (the Earl of Ellenborough) must say that, taking into consideration all the circumstances, the conduct of the Court of Directors, in refusing payment to the Prince, was very ungenerous and unwise; but, at the same time, he agreed with the noble Duke that it was neither for the advantage of native princes, nor, generally, for the advantage of the Government of India, that those princes should come and reside in this country in order to prosecute their claims. He had himself privately advised the Rajah of Coorg, four years ago, to return to his own country, being quite confident that it would be more to his own credit and comfort to rest in the midst of his family at Benares, where he was very much respected, than to reside as an individual unknown in this country; and he now publicly renewed that advice. As to the suit against the East India Company for the recovery of his property, he could not comprehend how a question of that kind between two Sovereigns—for such they were—could be made the subject of inquiry before the English Court of Chancery; and he believed it would be found, in the course of the investigation, that the property neither belonged to the Court of Directors nor the Government of India, nor the Rajah, but to the Crown, and that it had been misappropriated by the Government of India. If this Prince were dispossessed of his property in consequence of military operations, it clearly, as the prize of war, belonged, not to the Government of India, but to the Crown; and if the Crown asserted its right, the Rajah would be deprived of all excuse for not returning, and the Company of any reason for conducting themselves towards him in a manner most ungenerous and uncourteous. He should, therefore, strongly recommend the noble Duke to suggest to the law officers of the Crown to inquire into the matter.

SUMMARY DISMISSAL OF THE MILITIA IN IRELAND—QUESTION.

VISCOUNT DUNGANNON rose to ask the Secretary of State for War—Whether he had received any official communication of the Dismissal of fifty-seven men of the City of Limerick Artillery Militia, from Youghal, on the 5th instant, who were suffered to depart, many of them, with scarcely any clothing, and who had to proceed all the way to Limerick with only six-pence allotted to each individual? And, also, Whether it was correct that 240 men were discharged on the 10th instant from the Curragh, belonging to the Mayo Rifles, to find their way home, with only one day's pay allotted to them? It appeared, that on the 5th of July notice was given to the Limerick Artillery Militia, that such as were disposed to avail themselves of the permission, might at once proceed to their homes. About fifty-seven men availed themselves of the permission, and they were accordingly suffered to go home; but in what manner? They were deprived of their clothing, and given sixpence each, to enable them to proceed from Youghal to Limerick. On their way to Limerick they were obliged to pass the night under haystacks or in open fields, and they reached that city in a state of destitution and nakedness. It was also stated that on the 10th of July 240 men were dismissed at the Curragh from the Mayo rifles, and sent on their journey homewards with only one day's pay allotted to each of them. He had that morning learnt further that 240 men of the Queen's County Militia had been dismissed with much the same amount, and entirely deprived of their clothing, and consequently had to go about begging for raiment. It might be replied that all this was strictly according to regulations; but if such were the regulations they reflected very little honour on the country, and very little credit on the Government; and though he admitted that distress did not justify crime, yet he thought that if these men had committed any thefts, the moral responsibility would rest on those who had driven them to that course of conduct. They could not forget the circumstances under which the militia had been embodied. They would not forget the alacrity and readiness which every class of persons had shown to serve the country during the late war; and he must ask was this a fair return for such alacrity and such readiness, and for such faithful services? It might be said that these men could have applied to the parishes through which they had passed; but if they had done so they would have been sent to the next union-house; and he must ask whether the union-house was the place for those who had had the honour to wear Her Majesty's uniform? They knew not, in the present aspect of Europe, how soon the services of the militia might again be required; but was it likely that such treatment as this would ultimately tend to the advantage of Her Majesty's service and to the interests of the State in general? The Irishman was, above all others, susceptible of the feelings of gratitude, but he was equally alive to a sense of injustice and ill-treatment; and therefore the House must not be surprised if a knowledge of these facts should extend to every quarter in Ireland. He was afraid that the Government would find that they had been influenced on this occasion by a feeling of false economy. The present state of Ireland was tranquil, but that would not justify the Government in turning loose a large body of men without the means of support or the hope of employment. He had been led to believe that the disembodiment of the militia in Ireland—would not have taken place until after the harvest. But he found that the disembodiment had been fixed for not later than the 7th of August; and he must say that a more inconvenient and inappropriate time could not be selected, as at that period employment would be scarce, and difficult to be obtained. He understood that it was intended to call out the militia for twenty-eight days' training in each year. He was afraid that when the time came the muster in Ireland would be a sorry one. The feelings which existed on this subject would become general in Ireland, and he believed he might say, as a notorious fact, that from Ireland had sprung many of the most gallant and brave soldiers who had distinguished themselves in the service of this country. He did not mean to say that the Government was bound to find employment for these men; but, surely, it would have been better to have dismissed them with proper clothing, and with a sufficient gratuity. He hoped that the noble Lord the Secretary for War, would be enabled to say that these statements were unfounded; but if that, unfortunately, should not be the case, then he trusted that his noble Friend would be enabled to state that this proceeding had not been approved of, or received the sanction of Her Majesty's Government. One satisfactory result would at least arise from his putting this question—it would show the people of Ireland that in both Houses of Parliament there were Members who were willing to take up their case, and to fix public and parliamentary censure upon those who might deserve it. The noble Lord concluded, by putting his question to the Secretary for War.

LORD PANMURE said, the noble Lord's first question related to the dismissal of fifty-seven men of the City of Limerick Artillery Militia from Youghal on the 5th instant, and the noble Lord drew a very melancholy picture of their condition at the time of their discharge. He could only state in answer to that question that he had received no such information, either officially or privately; and he apprehended that had such an occurrence taken place it must have come to the knowledge of the Lord Lieutenant, who had recently been in Limerick, and his Lordship would have taken care to apprise him of it. In answer to the noble Lord's second question, as to the discharge of 240 men from the Curragh with only one day's pay, he had to state that the men were permitted—not discharged—to retire from the regiment and go to their homes, in order to find employment, which they had been led to expect was open to them. They were allowed the proportion of pay and gratuity due to them up to that time, and thus provided for the journey home they quitted the service. With regard to the disembodiment of the militia he had already stated that it was the intention of Government that the disembodiment should take place at a time when the men could be employed in the harvest. He saw nothing in the present state of Ireland to prevent them doing this, and justice required that they should deal with the Irish militia in the same way that they dealt with the English and Scotch, and this would be done.

THE SLAVE TRADE IN THE BRAZILS.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY rose to move, that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for Copies of any Correspondence that has lately taken place between Her Majesty's Government or the British Envoy at Rio Janeiro and the Brazilian Government on the subject of the Slave Trade. As he saw that the correspondence had been promised to the other House of Parliament by the noble Lord at the head of the Government, he might assume that the noble Earl (the Earl of Clarendon) would at once concur in his Motion. It might be supposed, therefore, that he need not detain their Lordships, but the subject was one of paramount importance, and he might have no other opportunity of calling attention to it during the present Session. It appeared that owing to a correspondence, which he could not describe in any other terms than as ill-judged, the Brazilian Government were greatly offended with the Government of this country, and the discussions that had taken place in consequence in the Representative Assembly of Brazils appeared to threaten a dissolution of the amicable relations between the two countries. It seemed to him that there was scarcely a single country the friendship and alliance of which were of greater consequence to Great Britain than the friendship and alliance of the Brazils. It was entitled to English sympathies, as well from its position as from its character. Without offending that Government or the Sardinian Government, he might say of Brazil that it was the Sardinia of South America; for, while the other States of South America, with the exception of Chili, were almost all under the despotism of republican anarchy, the Brazilians were enjoying a constitutional Government and every day reaping increased prosperity. Looking at it through our material interests, their trade with Great Britain was immense; and, looking forward to the changes and chances which might affect our relations with the United States, there was no country the alliance of which would be of greater consequence than the Brazils, supposing, unfortunately, that we should be at war with the United States. If we should then be on unfriendly terms with the Brazils, privateers might be sent from the Brazilian coast to annoy our trade, and adventurers from the United States might thus inflict very great injury upon our commerce. Great Britain had always been on very good terms with the Brazilian empire; but at times there had been disputes with it, not in reference to any points of policy, but in relation to the slave trade, which used to be carried on with great barbarity and to a great extent in the Brazils. In 1826, a treaty was made with the Brazilian Government for the total abolition of the slave trade, and mixed courts were appointed for the trial of offences. Matters, were, however, shortly afterwards in so unsettled a state in the Brazils that the slave trade was not suppressed as was desired; and in 1845, the noble Earl (the Earl of Aberdeen), who was then Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, took a strong step, which he would not find fault with, as it answered its purpose, and was, perhaps, necessary at that time. An Act of Parliament was passed, prohibiting all Englishmen from carrying on the slave trade, permitting British cruisers to capture all vessels engaged in the slave trade within Brazilian waters, and empowering them to cruise in all Brazilian waters and to seize slave vessels under the very guns of Brazilian fortresses. No stronger step could have been taken—nothing could be more insulting to an independent nation, and the Brazilian Government naturally felt the deepest indignation and anger, although they were obliged to submit to the superior force of this country. Years passed on, and partly by the efforts of our cruisers—and, it was only justice to say, partly in consequence of the sincere and loyal co-operation of the Brazilian Government—the slave trade in that country decreased most rapidly. In 1852, when the Earl of Derby came into power, he (the Earl of Malmesbury) found that the irritation and humiliation of the Brazilian Government were exceedingly great, for they thought Great Britain had legalised a kind of piracy for the purpose of abolishing the slave trade. Of course, no Act of Parliament of this country could interfere with international law, but the Act of Parliament protected those who acted under it. The Government of Lord Derby thought the time had come when the action of this law might be modified, and said they felt so much confidence in the loyal intention of the Brazilian Government to suppress the slave trade, that they would—not abolish that Act—but suspend it. From this time the Act had remained suspended, and the slave trade had decreased most rapidly, so that in the course of two or three years not more than two or three slavers were seen on that coast, and they had been captured and taken. About the end of 1855, however, a slaver managed to land a cargo—and it appeared that forty-seven of these slaves were kidnapped and taken up the country. Out of those forty-seven, ten or twelve made their escape, so that not more than about twenty of these slaves were carried into the interior. It surely would have been sufficient to have pointed out this to the Brazilian Government, and to have asked for an explanation; but, instead of that, Mr. Jerningham, our Chargé d'Affaires at Rio, presented a note to the Brazilian Government, the terms of which, to say the least, were most uncourteous. He might not be in order, and it would certainly be anomalous if he were to read the supposed despatch, as published in the public journals, when he was moving for a correct copy of the correspondence; but he did not exaggerate the fact in characterising it as most uncourteous. Mr. Jerningham, after stating the extreme disappointment of the English Government at the laxity of the Brazilian Government, proceeded at once to say that, if there were any repetition of such a ground of complaint, the humiliating Act of 1845 would be put in force; and, not satisfied with that mortifying threat, he further said that British vessels would enter the harbours and rivers of the Brazils and seize the slavers, and that, if the Brazilian courts did not convict the offenders, English courts would be found to have the courage to do so. He had hoped that, from the moment the noble Earl entered the Foreign-office, a certain style which pervaded the correspondence of that office would be at an end. The style he alluded to commenced in the year 1830, and continued to the year 1841. It then disappeared, but it began again in the year 1846, and continued to the end of the year 1851. It was a very peculiar style. Whatever the circumstances, the stereotyped despatch opened by expressing the unqualified displeasure of Her Majesty's Government, and concluded with some menace. The Minister of Foreign Affairs always sounded his trumpet from the highest note in the gamut, and the consequence was he could never use any other note without descending in the scale. He did not think that was a judicious mode of conducting our foreign affairs, because strong nations retaliated by insolent replies, and weak nations retained a dislike to the English Government ranking in their minds, and, perhaps, leading to a dislike of the English people. Although he might have had to find fault with his noble Friend (the Earl of Clarendon) for exhibiting too much of the fortiter in re, he never anticipated having to accuse him of the want, as in this case, of suaviter in modo. The note from the Brazilian Minister in reply, displayed great anger and mortification, but was written in very dignified language. He did not wish to quote the note, but the Brazilian Minister said he had explained this very case to Mr. Jerningham, that he had shown Mr. Jerningham that many of the slaves had been recaptured, and that he had promised to recapture as many more as possible. That interview took place early in February, and the note was written on the 7th of March. He supposed that in the meantime a despatch had been received from the Foreign Office in reply to the first account of the transaction which was sent home. The Brazilian Minister subsequently showed that only twenty slaves remained not recaptured, and he said the pursuit was stopped because the prevalence of yellow fever made it certain some of the troops would be lost. The Brazilian Minister detailed the difficulties incident to the geographical nature of the country, and closed his despatch by expressing his astonishment at the humiliating threat of the English Minister, when on the 4th of February Mr. Jerningham had complimented the Brazilian Government on the capture of the Mary Smith. When the Brazilian Chambers met—and he would say in passing that he had been much surprised at the talent which had been shown in their debates—great indignation at such a note being presented to the Brazilian Government was expressed by all parties. The King sympathised with that disapprobation. The public press, to a unit, was very violent against us, and two of the most distinguished speakers denounced our conduct as most unjust and insulting. Other members of the Chambers, perhaps with less judgment, but not with less power of mischief, said very openly—

“If we are merely to be considered as the slaves and servants of Great Britain—if Great Britain is to inflict these threats on us, perhaps to be followed by stronger measures, the only thing we can do is to form other alliances.”

And then they plainly set forth the advantages of an alliance with the United States, observing that, with respect to slavery, they would meet with no difficulties whatever. He would ask the noble Earl whether such an alliance between the Brazils and the United States was desirable for this country? Considering the amount of our trade with the Brazils, their political position and their descent from our most ancient allies, the Portuguese, he conjured the noble Earl to pay that respect to the Brazilian Government which he thought they deserved, not only because it was our interest to respect them, but because they had really done their best to put an end to the slave trade. Of the good faith of the Brazilian Government he had proof in 1852, when he advised his noble Friend (the Earl of Derby) to suspend the Act. He had now also private information to the same effect, on which he could depend; and, as the slave trade could only be stopped by the determination of the Brazilian Government to stop it, he entreated the noble Earl not to restrain himself—for there was no danger from him of useless and insulting threats—but to restrain the rude and mischievous zeal of his subordinates. The noble Earl concluded by moving for the correspondence referred to.

THE EARL OF CLARENDON was understood to say that he concurred in a great deal which had fallen from the noble Earl. He thought the noble Earl had not exaggerated the importance of a good understanding between the Brasils and this country, and had correctly described the advantages to be derived from it, and he could not but regret the coolness that had arisen between the two countries. The noble Earl had accurately described the increasing prosperity of the Brasils, and the great advantage which must accrue from our alliance with a constitutional Government, which was in a state of settlement and tranquillity compared with the other States of South America. He thought, also, that we ought to be extremely grateful—and that gratitude had been constantly expressed in Parliament, in the press, and in official despatches—to the Brazilian Government for the manner in which they had co-operated in putting down the slave trade. He also took the same view as his noble Friend in reference to the Act of 1845. The Act was not in operation at the present moment, and the Brazilian Government were perfectly aware that Her Majesty's Government had no objection to alter the provisions of that Act, if provisions of equal stringency, or at all events having the same objects in view, were secured by treaty. Such a treaty was under consideration two years ago, but the Brazilian Government objected to grant the same conditions. Negotiations were still pending between the two Governments upon this point. It was, therefore, the fault of the Brazilian Government and not our fault that the Act still existed, and with it the power of menacing the Brazilian Government. But, although the slave trade had been effectually put down, there had been certain occurrences within the last year and a half which raised well-founded apprehensions that the trade might be re-established. The Brazilian Government had neglected to take any measures for effectual colonisation and immigration, whereby to secure a supply of labour. The slaves had died off, and there had been a remarkable mortality, owing to cholera and yellow fever. The consequences were, that the hands for field labour were very short, the price of slaves had risen enormously, and the temptation to engage in a very profitable trade had greatly increased. As some years ago 60,000 slaves were imported annually, their Lordships would have some idea of the enormous profits derived from this nefarious traffic, and with rising prices apprehensions were naturally excited that attempts would be made to supply the slave market. Those attempts were made last year, and upon a very considerable scale, the parties no doubt speculating upon the duration of the war in which we were then engaged, and the consequent difficulty of sending a sufficient naval force either to the African or to the Brazilian coast to prevent the renewal of the traffic. In the course of the last year notice was given by the Brazilian Government to the President of the province of Pernambuco, that a slaveship was expected to land her cargo upon that coast. The vessel did arrive, and exactly at the spot which had been indicated; but the police were all absent, and it was only after some time, by the act of a gentleman residing in the vicinity, who took on himself the duties of the police, that about 160 of the slaves were seized. The vessel was a schooner of 130 tons only, which had on board no less than 250 slaves. So little vigilance had been used, so little desire existed to prevent the introduction of the cargo, that two days after the arrival of the vessel one person went down and carried off forty of the negroes, and two days later another person selected sixty others. Representations were made upon the subject to the Brazilian Government, couched in terms of courtesy, such as the noble Earl had prescribed, and such as became the spirit of friendship which had always existed between the two Governments. Complaints of negligence and connivance were made against the President of Pernambuco, who not only would not allow the police to prevent the landing, but also would not permit any inquiry to take place upon the spot, but removed the investigation to a place six leagues from that where the landing had been effected, and where all eye-witnesses of it could easily have been procured. Moreover, in order that the gentleman who had seized the 160 slaves should not give evidence upon the subject, the President included him in the list of persons accused, and thus prevented him from being examined as a witness. When these facts came to his (the Earl of Clarendon's) knowledge, he instructed Mr. Jerningham, in the event of nothing being done by the Brazilian authorities, and of no action being taken by the Brazilian Government, in consequence, to inform that Government that it would be the duty of Her Majesty's Government to enforce the operation of the Act of Parliament to which the noble Earl had referred. He would read an extract from the despatch of Mr. Jerningham. He wrote on the 14th of March:—

“That he had learnt with pain and disappointment that the course taken by the Imperial Government and the Imperial authorities in recovering the Africans who were stolen at Serinhaem, and in following up the prosecution of the real individuals implicated in the whole of that slave-trade affair, is far from being satisfactory; and, in consequence of instructions which the undersigned has received from Her Britannic Majesty's Government, who have approved of the conduct and zeal which Her Majesty's consul, Mr. Cowper, manifested upon the above attempt at slave trading, the undersigned begs to intimate to the Brazilian Government that if they do not use their utmost efforts in discovering the real aggressors in this or any other similar acts of slave trading, and in prosecuting them with all the rigor of the law, and punishing all such as have been engaged in such slave-trade transactions, that the British Government will be obliged again to put in force the provisions of the Act of Parliament of 1845; and that while British cruisers will exercise on the coast, in the rivers, and in the harbours of Brazil, that watchfulness and activity which the agents of the Brazilian Government neglect to use, British courts of justice will pronounce those sentences of condemnation from which Brazilian courts may be found to shrink. The undersigned, after so many assurances on the part of the Imperial Government that they were using their utmost vigilance and energy to suppress the slave trade, and to punish offenders, regrets that the lax and unsatisfactory manner of the proceedings in the province of Pernambuco should occasion him to be obliged to signify to the Imperial Government the line of conduct which Her Majesty's Government will infallibly adopt in crushing and extinguishing all slave-trade transactions, if the Imperial Government do not command and force their own authorities to do their duty.”

It was under those circumstances that Mr. Jerningham felt himself justified in acting upon his instructions, and in addressing to the Brazilian Government that notice to which the noble Earl had referred. It was perfectly true that the Brazilian Government was angry at that communication. It was also perfectly true that debates took place in the Brazilian Chambers upon it, and that the Brazilian Minister had addressed to himself a remonstrance, urging that it was a mortification to the feelings of the Brazilian Government. He (the Earl of Clarendon) had replied, of course, that it was not the intention nor the desire of Her Majesty's Government to mortify the Brazilian Government, and that they desired to maintain the most friendly relations with it; but that the notice had been given from a fear that, owing to the altered circumstances of Brazil, great preparations were being made for the renewal of the slave trade, and it was intended in a friendly manner to put the Government of that country upon its guard that it might take proper steps in that matter. He trusted that all ill-will, such as had been alluded to by his noble Friend as having been manifested in the Brazilian Chambers upon this subject, had disappeared, and that the Government there had recognized the justice of the representations which had been made, as indeed he believed was the case, for it had already removed the President of Pernambuco from his post, and had given the best proof of its sincerity in undertaking to suppress the slave trade by appointing in his place the former Minister to this country, than whom a more honourable or upright man did not exist. Under these circumstances, and after the explanations which had been given, he hoped the Brazilian Government had ceased to entertain any ill-will upon this question, and had acquitted Her Majesty's Government of any wish to inflict mortification upon them. With respect to the papers for which the noble Earl had moved, some of them were already printed with other papers relating to the slave trade, and the remainder of the correspondence, which had occurred since March last, would be laid before Parliament next year.

THE EARL OF ABERDEEN said, the Act referred to had been introduced by himself ten or eleven years since, although with very great reluctance. He believed that Act was justified at the time by the circumstances which then existed, but undoubtedly it was a measure of extreme severity, only to be justified by strong necessity. At the time of the passing of the Act he had assured the Brazilian Government of his regret at having to propose such a measure, and that nothing would give him greater pleasure than being able to move for the repeal of that Act. He had even hoped that the time for repealing the Act had come, and only yesterday he had been prepared to communicate with his noble Friend the Foreign Secretary upon the subject; but he regretted to find that what he had imagined had been completely effected by the Brazilian Government had not taken place, and that there were some symptoms of a renewal of the slave trade. Under these circumstances, he could not blame the threat, as it was called, of a renewal of the Act; but he hoped, from what had taken place, that the conduct of the Brazilian Government was, and would continue to be, such as not only would render unnecessary any enforcement of the Act, but would also speedily render its total repeal justifiable and practicable. He quite agreed with the noble Earl opposite as to the interest of this country in cultivating the alliance of the Brazilian Government, for the conduct of that Government stood in favourable contrast with that of other Governments in South America. The interest we had in maintaining friendly relations with Brazil, the extent of our commercial relations with that country was such as to be a matter of paramount importance. Therefore, while approving of the energy of the measures adopted, he hoped that by kindness and conciliation the noble Earl would be able, before long, to place matters on the most satisfactory footing with the Brazilian Government.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY agreed with his noble Friend that the Brazilian Government had proved their loyalty by appointing the gentleman alluded to in place of the President of Pernambuco. He was satisfied with the explanation of the noble Earl (the Earl of Clarendon) to a certain extent; but he thought that all that had been obtained from the Brazilian Government might have been obtained in a different manner—without the presentation of a note of remonstrance, which was an official document of extreme character. It was with the manner and not with the spirit of the communication that he found fault. He by no means wished to discommend his noble Friend's anxiety to put down the slave trade; but he did think that his noble Friend or his agent had been extremely mistaken in the manner in which they had conducted the correspondence with the Brazilian Government.

Motion agreed to.

ISMAIL AND RENI—DIPLOMATIC INTERCOURSE WITH RUSSIA—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY said, he now wished to ask his noble Friend (the Earl of Clarendon) another question of which he had given notice—namely, whether it was true that the two fortresses of Ismail and Reni, which were included in the cession of that portion of the territory which the Russian Government had made over to Turkey by the treaty of Paris, had been, as he was informed they were, totally and entirely dismantled? It was manifest, he thought, that the territory of the Delta was of little use as a bulwark to Turkey if no fortresses were maintained there. While Ismail stood as a fortress no Russian army could cross the Danube without leaving those fortresses in their rear; whereas if they were once destroyed, the whole geographical face of the country in regard to an invasion by Russia would be in the same state as before the war. Considering then that the Allies had taken a great part of Sebastopol; that they had also taken Kinburn, Kertch, Eupatoria, Kamiesch, and some of the fortresses on the Circassian coast, it appeared to him that we had had nothing like a fair exchange, even supposing that Ismail and Reni remained untouched, and still less was that the case if these places were reduced from the condition in which they were when the propositions of Austria were made to their present defenceless state. He wished to ask his noble Friend, therefore, if it were true that these fortresses had been dismantled before their evacuation by the Russians? If they had been, whether it was the result of any agreement which had been come to at the Congress at Paris? Whether the Turkish Government would not be obliged to maintain fortresses in the same position?—for in the case of a guaranteed country like Turkey there should have been a condition that the fortresses should be maintained. He would also ask whether any fortresses were to be rebuilt on the right and left bank of the Danube; and if so, by what soldiers they were to be garrisoned?—for it was of consequence, if fortresses were to be maintained there, that they should be garrisoned by troops who would be free from the temptation of Russian intrigue. There was another question to which he was desirous of calling the attention of his noble Friend. With some degree of hurry after the peace was concluded, his noble Friend despatched

Lord Wodehouse to St. Petersburg as Minister from the British Court, and that noble Lord had been there for at least a month; but never yet, to his (the Earl of Malmesbury's) knowledge, nor he believed to the knowledge of any one of their Lordships, had any Minister or representative appeared at St. James's from the Russian Court. Now, without being extremely punctilious upon such points, it was nevertheless desirable that diplomatic usages should be studied a little more minutely, and that we should not run any risk of jeopardising Her Majesty's dignity by sending an envoy to Russia without ascertaining that one was coming to represent that country in England. He should like to know, therefore, why no accredited Minister had yet arrived from St. Petersburg; and when he might expect to see the Court of Russia represented at the Court of Her Majesty?

THE EARL OF CLARENDON: I will answer the questions of my noble Friend in the order in which he has put them. With regard to the question as to the fortresses of Ismail and Reni, I cannot exactly state what has been actually done as to those Danubian fortresses, because the Commissioners appointed to settle the frontier of Moldavia have been occupied with other business, and have not yet been able to give their attention to the state of those fortresses. I have heard this morning from St. Petersburg that there had been no report received there of what had been done upon the subject. I have no doubt, however, that those fortresses have been dismantled, and I think it is a very unusual proceeding on the part of the Russian Government—a very unfortunate mode of inaugurating the peace. There were no regular precautions taken or arrangements made in the Treaty of Paris about the manner in which those fortresses should be given up. I should have considered it almost an affront to require any explanation as to the way in which a thing was to be done with regard to which there could have been no difference of opinion. I understand the Russian Government to assert that they considered that they had a right, until the boundary of the frontier was marked out, and until the country had been given over to the Allies, to demolish any fortresses on the Danube in the same manner as the Allies had to demolish the works at Sebastopol. But there is this very great distinction. Since the peace has been signed nothing has been demolished by the Allies, nor any act of aggression committed; whereas the dismantling of the fortresses of Ismail and Reni took place after the peace was signed. We being in possession of Eupatoria, of Kinburn, and, more particularly, of Kertch, we might, in retaliation, have destroyed all the public works of those places; but we considered that, as soon as peace was signed, the places became Russian, and it would have been dishonourable on our part to meddle with those works; and, on the same principle, we contend that from the moment the peace was signed Russia had no right to meddle with these Danubian fortresses. Such, my Lords, is the opinion of Her Majesty's Government on this subject, and it has been communicated to the Court of Russia; but we have as yet received no formal answer on the subject. There is another fortress to which my noble Friend has not alluded—that of Kars—concerning which I have made some inquiry from the Russian Government. The answer which I have received is, that the moment peace was signed an Imperial order was sent to Kars directing that nothing there should be destroyed—otherwise the destroying of the citadel of that fortress would have been an express violation of the Treaty of Paris; but it was stated that owing to the disturbed state of the country, those orders were delayed on the route, and before they arrived some destruction of the works had already taken place; the moment, however, the Imperial mandate reached no further damage was done. There has been a report that on a part of the territory that is to be ceded to Moldavia certain Crown lands have been sold, and the answer to an inquiry on this subject is, that some authorities were proceeding to sell Crown lands, but that the Russian Government admitted that they were no longer theirs to deal with, and the sale had been stopped. The Russian Government have stated in the strongest terms that their object is to carry on everything connected with the peace in the most faithful manner, and I can only hope that for the future nothing will occur to destroy the confidence which, after peace has been established, should exist between the different countries. With regard to the arrival of the Russian Minister in this country, I have to say that we received an official intimation from Baron Brunow when he came to this country to deliver a letter to Her Majesty, that Count Creptowitch had been appointed Minister to this country. As he had been so long in coming, and this country was left without a representative of Russia, which was somewhat disrespectful to Her Majesty, I inquired at St. Petersburg the reason of the delay, and I have been informed that the Minister will be here at the end of the month, and that the delay had been the result of unavoidable causes.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH: When the Russian Government ceded the territory on the left bank of the Pruth, of course they ceded at the same time the fortresses situated in that territory. It had been invariably the custom, so far as his memory went, when fortresses had been ceded, to insert provisions in the treaty detailing the manner in which they should be given up, and whether the guns, ammunition, archives, and plans should be included; and if the noble Earl now complained that Ismail and Reni had been dismantled the fault was his own, for not taking the precautions which all Governments had hitherto adopted of making such provisions as he had referred to. He regretted that in this instance, and in the other less important instance his noble Friend had referred to, there should be the least glimmer, or the least appearance, of any misunderstanding between this country and Russia with regard to the performance of the treaty.

THE EARL OF CLARENDON: The noble Earl's remarks are founded upon the cases of fortresses which were named in the treaty. In this instance they were not named.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH: Just so.

THE EARL OF DERBY: The not naming the fortresses to be surrendered was, in his opinion, an additional instance of neglect on the part of the noble Earl. The value of the ceded territory, in fact, consisted in these fortresses; and the omission to name them is, I repeat, an additional instance of negligence on the part of the noble Earl. The noble Earl admitted that in this case Russia had acted towards us, if not with a breach of faith, yet with the breach of an understanding, whilst, in another case, she had treated us with considerable discourtesy, which did not augur very well for the continuance of the patched-up peace that had been concluded. He should be glad to know, as the noble Earl had received some answer from the Russian Government with regard to his remonstrances on the subject of Kars, whether he had also received any answer, and if so, what answer, to his remonstrances as to the other fortresses, Ismail and Reni.

THE EARL OF CLARENDON: I must remind the noble Earl that it was not with reference to these fortresses that the territory on the banks of the Danube was ceded by Russia, nor did they form the most important part of that territory. The object of that cession of territory by the "patched-up peace," as the noble Earl terms it, but which peace has given great satisfaction to the country, was that Russia should not have access to the Danube by the continued possession of that territory. In answer to the noble Earl's question, he begged to say that he had not received from the Russian Government any conclusive reply to the communication addressed to them on the subject of Ismail and Reni.

CONSOLIDATION OF THE STATUTE LAW.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR rose, pursuant to notice, to call the attention of the House to the Second Report of the Commissioners for Consolidating the Statute Law. The subject, he said, was one of rather a dull and uninviting character, but he trusted that, considering its great importance, their Lordships would allow him for a few moments to occupy their attention. It would be in the recollection of some of their Lordships that, immediately after the Session of 1854, Her Majesty was advised by the Government to issue Her Commission to a number of distinguished legal functionaries and persons who filled high stations in the law, authorising them to Consolidate the Statute Law, as far as they should consider it advisable, with power to introduce into that consolidation any portion of the common law of the land which they might think necessary to make it work smoothly and well. In accordance with a suggestion from a noble and learned Lord not now present (Lord Lyndhurst), it was made an instruction to the Commissioners not merely to consolidate the existing law but to offer any recommendation which occurred to them as to an improved method of future legislation. He need hardly say that the whole task was one of almost overwhelming difficulty. The Statutes of this realm were contained in about forty quarto volumes, printed, as their Lordships were aware, in very small type and presenting the most uninviting aspect. They numbered altogether about 15,000. At the outset, he might observe that the appointment of this Commission partook in no respect of a party character. The first point to which the attention of the Commissioners (among whom were Lords Lyndhurst and Brougham, Lord Campbell, Sir J. Jervis, Sir Frederick Pollock, Sir James Parke, Vice-Chancellor Page Wood) was directed was as to the mode in which they should proceed. It was suggested that there ought to be a sort of general sketch of the whole of those Statutes, ranged under different heads, each of which should be consolidated into one or more Statutes; and this was to a certain extent set on foot, but was found to be almost impracticable. The Commissioners formed themselves into sub-committees, and it was an instruction to one of them to endeavour to improve and simplify the language of the existing Statutes. In the endeavour, however, to improve and simplify the language in which these Statutes were couched, and to introduce any portion of the unwritten law which seemed necessary, such extreme difficulty was soon experienced that the course determined upon was to make a general and improved classification, and then to proceed to consolidate under these different heads the different Statutes. The subject was divided into criminal law—law relating to property, and the law relating to mercantile matters. That did not exhaust the subject, but it went a long way to do so. The Commissioners made a Report at the end of the last Session of Parliament, and stated what they had done; the Bills, however, upon which they were employed were not in a state to be introduced to Parliament. They found that their work would be useless unless an improved method of legislation were adopted for the future, for otherwise, very soon after consolidation was effected, the work would have to be recommenced and done over again. In their Report laid before Parliament last Session they, therefore, made the following suggestion—

“We, therefore, beg leave to submit to your Majesty that in our opinion the most effectual method for insuring simplicity and uniformity in, or otherwise improving, the form and style of future Statutes, would be the appointment of an officer or board, with a sufficient staff of assistants, whose duty it should be—To advise on the legal effect of every Bill which either House of Parliament should think fit to refer to them, and, in particular, on the existing state of the law affected by the proposed Bill, its language, and structure, and its operation on the existing law; and also to point out what Statutes it repeals, alters, or modifies; and whether any Statutes, or clause of Statutes, on the same subject-matter are left unrepealed or conflicting; so that the House may have at its command the materials which will enable it to deal properly with the Bill.”

This subject was fully considered during the recess, and early in the present Session of Parliament the Commissioners came to the unanimous conclusion that the step here recommended was absolutely necessary, in order to put legislation upon a creditable footing for the future. And this is a course which the Government intend to recommend. It was necessary, however, that such a course, if taken, should be taken at the beginning of the Session of Parliament. The Commissioners had suggested, and the Government intended to propose, the appointment of an officer who should perform with regard to public Bills duties in a great measure analogous to those which were performed for private Bills by the Examiner of Private Bills, with this difference, however, that he was to be appointed by both Houses of Parliament. There was a precedent for that in the Examiner of Standing Orders, who was the same individual for both Houses, and was appointed by both Houses. Of course it would not be his duty to interfere in any way with the policy of Bills, which necessarily rested with the Legislature. It often happened, both in Bills introduced by private Members and by the Government—there being no person whose immediate duty it was to look into the public Bills to see how far they harmonised with existing laws, how far they clashed with current legislation, and how far their language was such as ought to be adopted—that blunders crept in which caused the greatest confusion, and often necessitated the repeal of the Bills themselves in the course of the next Session. Scarcely a Session elapsed without an instance of this. The appointment of such an officer would have the beneficial effect in stopping the grosser part of this evil. He had said that the Statute-book contained 15,000 Acts; but many of them would not be called laws in any other country; for they were mere matters of regulation. It had always been the policy of this country to refer to the Legislature matters which in other countries were ordinarily mere matters of administration, such as the regulation of the army and navy, financial matters, local legislation, and the like. The moment these Acts had done their duty, there was no longer any necessity that they should retain a place on the Statute-book; they were merely temporary enactments, they laid down no general rule of conduct, and they were not laws in the proper meaning of the word. At the beginning of this year the Statute Law Commission—one of whom was Mr. Coulson, whose experience in these matters was of great value—had taken the trouble to analyze the Acts passed last Session. They were 134 in number, and sixty-eight of them were merely temporary enactments, into which nobody would ever need to look when they had served the particular purpose for which they were passed. Less than one-half were laws properly so called. In bulk the difference was greater. The whole legislation of the Session occupied 1,005 pages, and of these only 226 pages were occupied by laws properly so called. There was now in existence one classification of Bills—namely, their separation into public and private Bills. It had occurred to the Commissioners that this classification might be carried much farther, by separating the annual and temporary Acts from the others. That would reduce the bulk of legislation to one-third of what it would otherwise be; and of that third one-third related only to India and the Colonies. By means of this classification the actual statute law would be reduced to the smallest space. With that view he proposed to call attention to the recommendations of the Commissioners, and the Government early next Session proposed to establish such an officer as he had already described, and he hoped both Houses would acquiesce in the appointment of some Committee, such as that which existed with regard to Private Bills, who should be in communication with this officer. During the past Session a great number of Bills had been prepared by the Statute Law Commission, some of which might have been laid before Parliament, but that he himself had not had time enough to look through them with sufficient care to be able so introduce them on his official responsibility. Others had not yet been revised by the public departments to which they related. For instance, a Bill had been prepared for the consolidation of the whole law relating to stamps, which had been laid before the Board of Stamps, but which could not, of course, be laid before Parliament until it had received the alterations which that Board might suggest. The consolidation of the criminal law had been undertaken by Lord Wensleydale, the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, Sir Fitzroy Kelly, and Mr. Greaves, who had been formed into a Committee for that purpose. They found that there were some offences as to which consolidation would be inconvenient, and even impracticable in a great measure. There were a great many offences arising out of certain Acts done in respect to the Customs, and it was thought that the consolidation of the Customs Acts would be imperfect if it did not contain the criminal part as well as the civil part. Again, the same remark applied to the bankrupt laws:—if a bankrupt did not surrender he was liable to serious penal consequences, but to introduce that class of offences into a general measure relating to crimes and punishments would have induced the necessity of explaining the laws with respect to bankruptcy. Therefore, these two classes of offences were omitted in the Bills in question. Another class of offences which would not be found in the Bills were offences relating to religion. There was a number of old statutes on that subject, which, on consideration, the Commissioners thought it best at once to ask Parliament to repeal, because they related to the habits and usages of a bygone day. In some instances these Acts would now almost excite a smile, and, as much time would be required to consolidate all the statutes on this subject, that part of the business stood over, and was not embraced by the Bills he was now speaking of. With these exceptions, the Statute Law Commissioners had comprehended in six statutes all the law relating to indictable offences, classed under the heads of offences of high treason, of offences against public justice, against the person, of larceny and theft, of malicious injury to property, and of forgery, which he now laid upon their Lordships' table. Besides these, there was embodied in another short Bill all the Acts relating to the law with regard to principal and accessory in criminal cases, and in an eighth Bill was consolidated all the Acts relating to criminal procedure on indictments, juries, &c. These measures, the Commissioners believed, embodied all the enactments of forty Acts of Parliament, and portions of 150 others, and from his own inspection of them, he believed that they did all that they professed to do. It was necessary for him to add that, after all, unless these Bills were taken, he would not say absolutely on trust, but much more so than was done with respect to an ordinary Bill introduced for the first time, consolidation would become impossible. He did not mean to say that oversights might not have been committed, but they might afterwards be remedied. It would be for Parliament to decide whether, on looking over some portion of the measures, it was satisfied with the diligence bestowed on them, and would not, therefore, subject them to that strict investigation which an entirely new enactment would require. In order to justify such a demand on the confidence of Parliament, a short report would accompany each Bill, pointing out any slight alteration in the existing law whenever it was found absolutely necessary to make such alteration. The rule which the Commissioners laid down for their guidance in framing these Bills was to make no change in the law, but in some few cases it had been found that that rule could not be adhered to. It had also been an object with the Commissioners to maintain, as nearly as possible, the language of the Acts they consolidated; but inasmuch as they found that the same offences were described sometimes in one set of words, and at others in another, they had adopted that set of words which they thought the best, and adhered to it throughout. At present the written laws of the country extended over forty volumes, and embraced some 15,000 Acts of Parliament. The Commissioners thought that the whole might be reduced to about 300 (some were sanguine enough to say 250) statutes, which might all be brought within the compass of three or four moderate-sized volumes. He would now lay the Bills on their Lordships' table; but he proposed to go no further with them than the first reading in the present Session, and to leave them to be considered during the recess.

The noble and learned Lord then presented the following Bills—

A Bill for consolidating the Statute Law of England relating to Criminal Procedure by Indictment [Criminal Procedure Bill]. A Bill for consolidating the Statute Law of England relating to Accessories to and Abettors to Indictable Offences [Accessories, &c. Bill]. A Bill for consolidating the Statute Law of England relating to Indictable Offences of a Public Nature [Offences of a Public Nature Bill]. A Bill for consolidating the Statute Law of England relating to Indictable Offences against Her Majesty the Queen and Her Government [Treason and Offences against the State Bill]. A Bill for consolidating the Statute Law of England relating to Indictable Offences by Forgery [Forgery Bill]. A Bill for consolidating the Statute Law of England relating to Indictable Offences against Property by malicious Injuries [Malicious Injuries to Property Bill]. A Bill for consolidating the Statute Law of England relating to Indictable Offences against Property by Larceny and other Offences connected therewith [Offences against Property Bill]. A Bill for consolidating the Statute Law of England relating to indictable Offences against the Person [Offences against the Person Bill].

FORMATION, &c., OF PARISHES BILL.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into a Committee, and for Standing Orders, No. 37 and 38, to be considered in Order to their being dispensed with, read: Said Standing Orders considered and dispensed with: House in Committee accordingly.

Clauses 1 to 8 agreed to.

LORD PORTMAN moved the omission of Clause 9, which empowered a Bishop, upon application from the minister or churchwardens of a church, to direct that a portion, not exceeding one-half, of the alms or voluntary contributions collected in the church or otherwise during the year, should be applicable to the maintenance of the minister and service of such church. His Lordship said that this power to authorise the Bishop to divide the alms collected at the offertory for the poor or for other purposes was founded upon a totally new principle, to which he entertained serious objections. Those persons who had contributed money for any particular charitable object would not like to see it applied, under the authority of the Bishop, for an entirely different object. Take, as an example, this case—a minister is in want of money, he obtains the aid of a very popular preacher, and asks for alms for a charity for the blind. The topic is one to arouse the feelings of every one—a large sum is contributed—the minister applies to the Bishop to divide the alms of the year, and thus obtains a considerable sum which was intended for the blind. This scheme is a part of the new so-called “Sacerdotal system,” and requires to be checked. He feared that the clause would either cause great discord between the minister and his congregation, or else put an end to almsgiving in churches altogether. As it is necessary to make any Amendments before the question on the whole clause is put, he would wait until the alterations about to be proposed were discussed, and at the right time he would move to omit the whole clause, for if this principle is once admitted it will be applied to all the parishes of the kingdom, though it is pretended that it is only to be applied in certain special cases.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY said, that the clause was in the Bill when it came up from the other House; but he did not like it then and he did not like it now. It had been introduced into the Bill in the Commons, where it was adopted without a division; and although he did not like it he did not intend to oppose it, because there were conflicting parties in the Church, and the introduction of the clause had tended to produce a harmony of feeling and to secure the passing of the Bill through the House.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY suggested an Amendment which would meet the difficulty—namely, to add after the words “or otherwise” in the last line but one the words, “not collected for any special purpose.”

THE EARL OF HARROWBY strongly objected to the clause. If it were permitted that the money collected in the church should be appropriated to other purposes, without any person being consulted but the minister or the churchwarden, people would withhold their alms and the poor would suffer. No aid was so gratefully received or so usefully distributed as the money collected at the offertory, which was distributed by the clergy, who generally accompanied the gift with kindly and useful advice. He advised their Lordships to leave the arrangements for the minister to depend upon the spontaneous good will of the parishioners. The proposal of his noble Friend (the Marquess of Salisbury) would meet a peculiar phase of the objection, but would not cover the whole of the case.

THE EARL OF DERBY thought it right to remind his noble Friend who had just sat down, and those other noble Lords who were not present on the Committee, that this clause must be considered, not on its own merits, but as taken in connection with another clause. Considerable objection had been, in the first instance, taken to the third clause; and that clause was postponed till the Committee came to the consideration of Clause No. 9. In all previous legislation on this subject, it was required that where a district church was proposed to be established, there should be a certain positive endowment of £150 a year guaranteed in the first instance. But it was obvious that in populous parishes that would be found to be a very poor provision for the clergyman; and by Clause 3 of the present Bill there was a waiving of that preliminary provision of an endowment of £150; but to meet that state of things Clause 9 was introduced, for the purpose of providing that wherever the endowment did not exceed £200, there should be this power of applying one-half the voluntary collections to the maintenance of the clergyman and the service of the Church. This Bill had been most carefully and deliberately considered by the other House. It had gone through a Select Committee there, and had come up to their Lordships' House recommended by a large majority. It was a measure which must be taken as a compromise between persons entertaining different views in regard to Church property. The Bill had also been sent before a Select Committee of their Lordships' House, who had given the measure their most careful attention. Such being the circumstances under which the Bill now appeared before them, he thought they would be hardly dealing fairly with the House of Commons if, at the present period of the Session, they made such an Amendment in the Bill as would endanger its passage through Parliament. He, therefore, hoped their Lordships would view the measure as a whole, and not reject the clause immediately under consideration. He did not think the clause unreasonable in itself, but was prepared to accede to the Amendment of his noble Friend near him (the Marquess of Salisbury).

Lord Portman

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET opposed the clause, which he considered the most objectionable feature of the Bill. The Amendment of the noble Marquess did not go far enough to remove his objection. He should move to omit the word “or,” between the words “minister and churchwardens,” for the purpose of inserting “and;” for although he was opposed to the whole clause, he was anxious, if it could not be omitted, to make it less obnoxious by making the application to depend on the actions of the minister and both the churchwardens, one of whom would represent the parish.

THE EARL OF WICKLOW thought that the clause was calculated to check parochial charities in all places where the Bill applied.

THE BISHOP OF OXFORD said, he knew many instances in which the church could not be supported at all if a portion of the collections were not carried to the use of the minister. He did not think such an appropriation could have a repressing effect upon charity. Although the clause was a new clause, yet it was a correlative of the novelty of the whole Bill itself, and was an attempt to meet the spiritual wants of the populations in new and ill-provided districts by voluntary contributions. He regarded the clause as absolutely necessary to the Bill, and if it was omitted he must withdraw his support of the measure.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY could see no necessity for mixing up two objects—the support of the clergy and the assistance of the poor. He thought it would be better to leave persons to contribute to either without forcing them to contribute to the other, whether they intended or not. He thought it would be better to withdraw the clause.

After a few words of explanation from the Bishop of OXFORD and the Earl of DERBY,

On Question, that the word “or” stand part of the clause, their Lordships divided:—Content 20; Not Content 20.

As the rule of the House is, that when the division is equal, it passes, pro negante, the word “or” was omitted.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET then moved to insert the word “and.”

Their Lordships again divided:—Content 20; Not Content 20.

The word “and” was not inserted.

LORD PORTMAN then said, as the clause is now made nonsense, he advised the House to reject the whole clause, and not be alarmed by the threat of the Bishop of Oxford, as the Bill will pass without the clause, and in spite of the right rev. Prelate. He ventured to correct Lord Derby as to the history of the clause in the House of Commons. It was inserted at a late stage of the Bill, and was quite unknown to almost all the House, and was, in fact, a surprise. The Select Committee of their Lordships had differed on the clause.

Their Lordships then divided on the Question, “That the clause stand part of the Bill.”—Content 20; Not Content 22; Majority 2.

The clause was consequently struck out.

Other Amendments made: Moved, That the Report of the Amendments be now received; objected to; and after short Debate, agreed to. Amendments reported accordingly; and Bill to be read 3^d To-morrow.

BISHOPS OF LONDON AND DURHAM RETIREMENT BILL.

Order of the Day for the Third Reading read.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 3^o.

LORD REDESDALE moved, that the Bill be read a third time that day three months. No Amendment had been introduced to remove the objections which he entertained to the measure; the correspondence which had been presented was of a most meagre character, and afforded but little information as to the negotiation which had taken place; and, believing still that too much of condition was attached to the retirement of the two right rev. Prelates, that the Bill was therefore of a simoniacal character, and that both politically and as regarded the Church, the worst consequences might be apprehended from it, he hoped their Lordships would not allow it to pass a third reading.

Amendment moved, to leave out “now,” and insert “this Day Three Months.”

THE LORD CHANCELLOR protested that there had been no negotiation whatever. When his right rev. Friend (the Bishop of Oxford) moved for the production of this correspondence, he said that he believed there were only two letters on the subject from the Bishop of London, and but one from the Bishop of Durham, and that he did not know even whether there was any answer by letter on the part of the Treasury. Of negotiation there had been none. It was perfectly true that, at a late period last year, the most rev. Prelate the Archbishop of Canterbury did, either verbally or by letter, inform his noble Friend at the head of the Government that it was the wish of the Bishop of Durham to resign; but nothing approaching to negotiation, and not one word of intercourse ever took place on the subject, as he believed, until the letter of the Bishop of Durham which appeared in the correspondence.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, he must take leave to remind the noble and learned Lord that on a former occasion he had himself stated that there had been no negotiation; but the correspondence now produced showed that negotiation there had been. As to the correspondence, perhaps their Lordships might be in possession of the whole of that which had taken place with regard to the see of London, but it was not possible that all had been published relative to the Bishop of Durham. Why, there was not even the simple acknowledgment on the part of the Prime Minister of the proposition made to him, of his assent to it, or of the course which the Government intended to pursue. There was only a letter from the right rev. Prelate, in which he stated that he was ready to resign upon the assurance from the Government that there would be guaranteed to him an allowance of £4,500 a year. Now, he (the Earl of Derby) presumed that that assurance had been given to the right rev. Prelate. Unless, therefore, this was a note got up for the purpose of being laid before Parliament, there must, he apprehended, be some further correspondence. The noble and learned Lord now declared that there had been no negotiation, but what did this letter say?

THE LORD CHANCELLOR denied having said that there had been no negotiation. What he meant to convey was, that there had been none except what appeared from the correspondence.

THE EARL OF DERBY: Their Lordships had been told the other day that there was no negotiation whatever, that the resignation was a spontaneous act on the one part and was so accepted on the other. Now, the Bishop of Durham himself stated that he could have wished to name a later date for his resignation, but that the noble Earl (the Earl of Chichester) informed him that this might be inconvenient to the Government, and he therefore acquiesced. The Bishop of Durham, for the sake of the convenience of the Government, having thus consented to give up his see on the 1st of August, although it would be inconvenient to him to leave the palace by that day, the noble Earl having informed him that a later day than the first of August would be inconvenient to the Government—[The Earl of CHICHESTER: I did not tell him that or anything of the kind.] Well, the Bishop of Durham said so, at any rate. Here were the papers put in in justification of the course taken by the Government; and this correspondence, he maintained, showed a distinct negotiation in order to consult the convenience of the Government, and then it suited those who entered into the negotiation to say that this was not a correct representation of what took place.

THE EARL OF CHICHESTER explained that the right rev. Prelate was under some misapprehension;—he had had no authority from the Government to negotiate with the Bishop of Durham; he had merely visited him as a friend to whom he had mentioned his wish to retire. By “inconvenient” he did not allude at all to the convenience of the Government; but he had used the word in the sense only of its not being creditable to his own character to delay his resignation beyond the day which was fixed for the resignation of the Bishop of London.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, it did not appear from this correspondence that any day whatever had been fixed for the resignation of the Bishop of London.

THE EARL OF WICKLOW said, he had voted for the second reading of the Bill, not because he thought it was a good measure, but upon the faith of the noble and learned Lord’s statement that the greatest possible inconvenience would arise to the public if it did not pass. He was led to believe that the two dioceses were suffering from the illness of their Bishops; but, on the declaration of the noble Duke opposite, that he had the authority of the Bishop of Durham for stating that his diocese had not suffered in the least from his absence, he could not believe that, so far as that diocese was concerned, there was any great urgency in the case. It would have been very much better to proceed by a general measure, and he was afraid that the passing of this Bill would retard the introduction of such a general measure. They might have followed the example of the Roman Catholic Church in this particular by appointing coadjutors or suffragan Bishops, whose incomes might have been provided out of the revenues of the respective dioceses. His original objections to the Bill were very much increased by a perusal of the correspondence. The transaction might not amount legally to simony; but, looking to the meaning of the word, for a Bishop to offer to place his see in the hands of the Minister on condition of being secured a certain income by law was as much simony as anything possibly could be. The present was a very good time for considering the expediency of dividing the diocese of London. There were two cathedrals, two deans, two episcopal residences, and, above all, an ample revenue. Having voted in favour of the Bill, he should not now oppose it, but should refrain altogether from voting.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY defended the measure, with respect to which no more negotiation had taken place than had occurred if any other course had been taken. If a general measure had been brought forward the same process—simo-niacal though it might be—must have been followed. Communications must have been entered into with the Bishops to ascertain what provision they would require, and the Legislature would have been called on to enact it in the same manner.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET said, he did not know whether this Bill involved an act of simony or not ; but this he did know—that when the Bill got down to the other House, it would be designated by a much stronger name than “simony.” It would be looked on there as a bargain between the Prime Minister and the Bishops, by which they, for a consideration, placed their sees in his hands—and for such transactions they had a strong name there, which they would not hesitate to apply. The allowances stipulated for were £6,000 a year in the one case, and £4,500 in the other. Suppose the House of Commons should decline to ratify this bargain, and should reduce the allowances to £3,000 a year in both cases, what a position the Government would be placed in. Their Lordships had become a party to the contract and must reject the compromise of the Commons. Of what avail, then, were all the protestations they had heard as to the necessity of this measure to avoid a scandal in the Church ? This was one of the worst measures which had ever been laid before Parliament, because it singled out two individuals—who had always been looked upon with great jealousy in certain quarters on account of their large income, and he was astonished that the Government could send such a scheme down to the other House to encounter the rude treatment of Radicals and Church reformers. It should have been a general measure intended to meet all cases.

THE EARL OF POWIS thought the Bishops had had but scant justice done them in this debate. If they had expressed their willingness to appoint suffragan Bishops, and to pay them the income which was to be paid to their successors, every one would have said that they had done well ; but what they had done was even more disinterested. The noble Duke had stated that when the Bill went down to the other House it would be said there that the Minister had been bargaining for two bishoprics, and he thought that the proposition of a general measure would have been more advisable. Now, if that course had been followed the Minister would have been accused of taking advantage of the particular circumstances of two bishoprics to introduce a measure giving him the reversionary appointment of a large number of Bishops. He conceived that much of the feeling which had been excited in respect to the Bill was to be attributed to the attempt of the noble and learned Lord on the woolsack to press it to a second reading at a time when the printed copies of the measure had not been distributed, and when their Lordships had not had an opportunity of knowing it was to come on.

VISCOUNT DUNGANNON looked on the Bill as establishing a most inconvenient and dangerous precedent. The measure was derogatory to the Church, and the correspondence laid on the table proved that there had been a bargain.

THE BISHOP OF OXFORD said, that the discussion on the Bill had not removed his objections to it. The whole course of this debate showed how unwise it was to make this a matter of individual legislation, for owing to these two particular Sees being dealt with in this way, every person who spoke on the subject, however careful he might be, ran the risk of having his statements turned into personal imputations. The Government were said to be actuated by a desire to obtain patronage, and the Bishops by a craving for money allowances ; and by this means the discussion partook of a character which a general measure would have avoided. Simony, if their Lordships looked into the law respecting it, would be found to have two aspects. The expression of an intention to engage in a corrupt bargain was an evil of the deepest dye. Now, he at once and altogether acquitted the right rev. Prelates in question and those who brought in the present Bill, of the slightest tendency to an intention to commit that moral evil, and he acquitted the Government of any wrong intention to grasp at patronage—on the contrary, he was convinced that they were all actuated by a sincere conviction that the Bill was necessary for the good of the State and the interest of the Church. But there was not only the moral aspect of simony ; there was, over and above, the legal aspect. Now, the present Bill did, in the most direct way, pass a peculiar privilegium or indemnity for the commission of the legal offence of simony. The legal offence was stated by 31 Eliz. c. 6, to consist in “corruptly taking for or in respect of resigning or exchanging the same directly or indirectly any pension or reward whatever.” [A NOBLE LORD :

Yes—corruptly taking.] Yes, the word “corruptly” was certainly used, but it was the bargain and not the incentive to it that was declared to be corrupt—the thing done and not the motive that actuated; and thus this Bill was a violation of the letter as well as of the spirit of the law. A noble and learned Lord had pointed out to him that the preamble of the Bill recited falsely the correspondence on which it professed to be founded, and observed that these words, “Whereas the said Bishops on relinquishing the income to which they are entitled in respect of their Sees are willing to receive the annual sums hereinafter provided for them during their lives,” &c., had no counterpart in the correspondence, there being no expression of a willingness, after resignation, to accept those sums. The noble and learned Lord had, therefore, drawn up certain words to be inserted instead of the words now in the preamble, and they were to the following effect:—

“Whereas the said Bishop of London, on being secured during his life the clear annuity of £6,000, and the Bishop of Durham, on the assurance that an allowance of £4,520 would be granted to him, &c., were willing to resign.”

The noble and learned Lord observed, that the words now in the Bill showed a shrinking from putting into plain English the direct bargain which the words implied, and being obliged to leave the House, he asked whether he (the Bishop of Oxford) would move his Amendment. He objected, then, to this Bill, for the reasons he had just stated; and, secondly, because he objected to the passing of the Bill for two of his own order, making a penal law not applicable to their future acts, and because it placed the Bishops on a different footing from the rest of the Ministry—from rectors, vicars, and other spiritual persons of the Church. He felt this to be an insuperable objection. In what an invidious position would the Bishops be placed if they were called upon to enforce the law against the clergy, they being at the same time a privileged class, exempt from the penalties of that law. As one of the class proposed to be so privileged he rejected their offer. Let the law of simony be dealt with as a whole; let this privilege, if it must be created, extend to those of the clergy who led lives of hardship and want, and who required it far more than the Bishops; but, for the sake of every class in the Church, let them not pass for the highest rank in the clergy a relaxation from which the lower ranks were to derive no benefit. There was another point to which he wished to call their Lordships' attention. By the 9 Geo. IV., c. 94, rectors and vicars were allowed to resign in favour of certain near relations of the patron, without incurring the penalties of simony; but a special provision was inserted, preventing that privilege from being exercised when the living was in the hands of the Crown. What, then, became of the argument, that they might deal with this case safely because the Crown was the patron? The Bill went right against the stream of precedent. It had been argued that, as it was manifest that there was no corruption in this case, as a necessary consequence there could be no simony. But by the law of simony, although both clerk and patron were ignorant of the transaction, and no corruption could therefore be attributed to them, yet if any other party were cognisant of an arrangement whereby money was to pass in consequence of the resignation of the benefice, the clerk would lose the benefice and never again be capable of presentation to it; and the patron would lose his patronage for that turn which would vest in the Crown. Although, therefore, there was in this case the most perfect purity—an almost heroic purity upon everything relating to money, on the part of his right rev. Friend—although it was perfectly impossible that his right rev. Friend could have dirtied his hands by any arrangement advantageous to himself, but detrimental to the interests of the Church, still, according to law, there remained a stain of simony upon the whole transaction which they were endeavouring by this Act to remove. He was anxious that their Lordships should understand the full force of the words in his right rev. Friend's letter—“if allowed by law.” He had reason for saying that the meaning of those words was:—“If the general law you are about to introduce allows you, then deal with my case.” He did not impute, and he never had imputed, to the Government, any attempt to deceive his right rev. Friend; but he did believe, upon his conscience, that they were holding his right rev. Friend to a bargain which he had made under a view of the case different from that which they had taken. He believed that his right rev. Friend had learnt from him as soon as from any one the nature of the Bill. His right rev. Friend had asked him what was being done with the general measure; he replied, that it had been sent back to the Government, and there was reason to expect the Government would introduce it; and his right rev. Friend also received information upon what he thought sufficient authority, although certainly not from a Member of the Government, that a general measure was within twenty-four hours to be laid before Parliament. In consequence of that expectation, he used the words "if allowed by law" in his letter, expressing his willingness to do this act, if he could do it under the general measure. Before proceeding with the Bill, they ought therefore to ascertain whether his right rev. Friend desired that it should pass, now the general measure had been dropped. He was sure that his right rev. Friend had not been informed that the general measure had not been introduced, and that this Bill was a privilegium to exempt him from penalties which would still attach to others in his position before his consent to the Bill had been obtained. He said, that the Government had not dealt fairly with one who had dealt generously and nobly with the public through a long public life. On all these grounds he must give his solemn non-content to the third reading of the Bill.

LORD DENMAN intended to vote against the Bill, and regretted that the Government had not fully investigated the law respecting coadjutor Bishops before introducing it. He thought they might have proposed a general measure which would have been beneficial to the whole community.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR wished it to be understood, as the question might be raised in another place, that he did not admit that the Acts to which this Bill referred would constitute simony at all, even without any Act of Parliament on the subject. As at present advised, he did not believe that the Statute of Elizabeth applied to Bishops.

Resolved in the Affirmative.

Bill read 3^a accordingly.

THE BISHOP OF OXFORD proposed a clause to the effect, that any surplus revenue from the two bishoprics should be paid to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and kept distinct until Parliament should determine whether and in what way Bishops should be allowed to resign their bishoprics from age and incapacity.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he could not agree to the proposal.

Clause negatived.

Amendments made: Bill passed, and sent to the Commons.

PROTESTS.

Against Third Reading of The Bishops of London and Durham Retirement Bill.

DISSENTIENT—"1. Because, by the Act of 26 Hen. VIII., c. 14, ss. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7, Her Majesty may, by her Royal letters patent, at the instance of any Bishop, out of two spiritual persons being learned and of good conversation, appoint a Titular Bishop for each diocese, in aid of the several Bishops, for a time to be limited by them, and such Suffragan Bishops may lawfully be paid by them out of their several revenues.

"2. Because any Act of Parliament on the subject of Resignations and Pensions of Bishops should be first considered (as it is in the nature of a Money Bill) in the Honourable the House of Commons, and should provide for the case of all living and future Archbishops and Bishops and Incumbents, and might therein incorporate an Act similar to 52 Geo. III., c. 62 (which applies solely to Ireland), for England and Wales.

"DENMAN."

DISSENTIENT—"1. Because the Bill is one of an abstract and personal character, framed to meet the case of two individual Bishops, and not one of a general and comprehensive nature.

"2. Because the Bill was introduced at so late a period of the Session as to render any discussion as regards either its principle, or the consequences it might involve by establishing an inconvenient and mischievous precedent, impossible.

"3. Because no serious evils to either diocese or to the Church in general could reasonably be apprehended from allowing matters to continue in their present condition a few months longer, when ample time would be afforded for the proper framing and full consideration of a general measure of relief calculated to prove essentially beneficial to the interests of the Church and the extension of sound religion.

"4. Because the sees of London and Durham are not at the present moment the only instance in which dioceses are deprived of the benefit of the active services of their Bishops, through age or infirmity; that such dioceses have an equal claim for consideration with those of London and Durham. Therefore, a Bill introduced to meet the case of two individual Bishops is unjust in principle, dangerous in practice, mischievous in example, and calculated to impede, rather than accelerate the progress of any future useful and comprehensive measure.

STANDING ORDERS.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, he would beg to move the adoption of the Report of the Standing Orders Committee, who had proposed certain alterations:—Of late a practice had grown up of moving long Amendments and new clauses on the third reading of Bills. During the present Session that practice had been carried out to such an extent that the principle of Bills had at the last moment been completely changed. The Committee on Standing Orders proposed, therefore, that no Amendments, except of a merely verbal character, should be introduced on the third reading of a Bill. Another and more important alteration which they proposed had reference to the revenues of India. By an Order, which dated from the Revolution, no Money Vote could be considered by the House unless it was recommended to them by the Crown. It had, however, been discovered in the recent discussion on the case of the Nawab of Surat, that no such rule existed with regard to India; and as the Indian revenues stood on precisely the same footing as the land revenues of the Crown, he did not see why such an exception should be allowed. The Committee therefore proposed the new Standing Order—"That this House will not receive any Petition or proceed upon any Motion for a charge upon the Revenues of the East India Company, without the recommendation of the Court of Directors, sanctioned by the Commissioners for the Affairs of India." He believed the hon. and learned Gentleman (Sir E. Perry) objected to the proposal, because he conceived that it would interfere with the right of the Indian subjects of Her Majesty to appeal to Parliament. That, however, he apprehended was a mistake. The natives of India would have precisely the same right as that possessed by the natives of this country. It would be open for any hon. Member to move on their behalf for a Committee of Inquiry or an Address to the Crown. The only other proposed alteration in the Standing Orders which he need mention was one to the effect that Committees might sit on Wednesdays or during morning sittings without obtaining the formal permission of the House.

On the Question being put, "That no Amendments not being merely verbal shall be made to any Bill on the Third Reading."

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he would beg to ask what was to constitute a "verbal" Amendment?

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, the Committee intended by that term anything which would make the least alteration in the meaning of a Bill. The Committee had only determined by the casting vote of the chairman to admit of any alterations at all; but it was thought that cases might arise in which there might be some little inaccuracies which it would be desirable to correct. He would beg at the same time to suggest that this alteration should not come into operation till next Session.

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, he thought the time chosen for the alteration of the Order was very unfortunate, seeing that the House had not long since had to reconsider its decision at the last moment. Under the proposed Order a Bill might be passed through Committee without Amendment, and reported the same night, and there would then be no opportunity of altering it; but the House, if it discovered any mistake, must reject the measure altogether.

LORD HOTHAM said, the Lords had of late years refused to receive Bills after a certain date; but they had themselves, no doubt accidentally, sent down important measures within a very short period before the close of the Session. He would therefore suggest that it might be desirable for the House to pass a Standing Order similar to that adopted in the other House—namely, that after a certain date they would receive no Bills from the House of Lords.

MR. WILKINSON said, he was sorry the Committee on Standing Orders had not taken some steps to prevent the waste of time which occurred every week, in consequence of Members moving Amendments on the Motion for the adjournment.

Ordered, "That no Amendments, not being merely verbal, shall be made to any Private Bill on the Third Reading."

Resolved, "That the several Standing Orders relating to Private Bills, as amended by the said Committee, be agreed to."

Ordered, "That Standing Order No. 84, relating to Private Bills, be repealed."

Ordered, "That no Amendments, not being merely verbal, shall be made to any Bill on the Third Reading."

Ordered, "That on Wednesdays and other Morning Sittings of the House, all Committees shall have leave to sit, except while the House is at Prayers, during the sitting, and notwithstanding any adjournment of the House."

Motion made, and Question proposed,—

"That this House will not receive any Petition or proceed upon any Motion for a charge upon the Revenues of the East India Company, without the recommendation of the Court of Directors, sanctioned by the Commissioners for the Affairs of India."

SIR ERSKINE PERRY said, he should move that this Order be rejected, for he thought it ran counter to the whole course of recent legislation with regard to India, and which he considered would involve the denial of justice. The hon. and gallant Member (Colonel W. Patten) said that natives of India would be placed in precisely the same position as the rest of Her Majesty's subjects. That, however, would not be the case. A native of this country, having a claim against the Crown, would not come before the House of Commons at all—he would have his petition of right; therefore, the natives of India were not advantageously situated even with regard to Motions in the House of Commons for an Address to the Crown. The inconvenience of the proposed Standing Order was exemplified by the difference of opinion which had arisen between the Board of Control and the Court of Directors as to the claim of the Nawab of Surat. The right hon. Member for Carlisle (Sir J. Graham) had expressed his opinion that, if some order of this kind was not adopted, the purity of that House would be tainted; but, although he (Sir E. Perry) was most anxious that the honour and character of the House should not be impeached, he thought the natives of India ought not to be deprived of the power of appealing to Parliament when they had suffered wrong. For those reasons, he should therefore move the omission of the Order.

MR. VERNON SMITH said, he considered that the Standing Order was necessary for the protection of the Indian revenues, and would beg to remind the hon. and learned Gentleman (Sir E. Perry) that it had received the approval of all the Members of the Committee except himself. He hoped it would not be supposed that the adoption of the Order would deprive the natives of India of any power of appeal, for they would have the same means of access to that House to represent any wrongs of which they had reason to complain as were enjoyed by any of Her Majesty's subjects.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, he was willing to substitute for the words, "without the recommendation of the Court of Directors, sanctioned by the Commissioners for the Affairs of India," these words, "without the recommendation of the Crown."

SIR JAMES HOGG said, he wished to remove a misconception which existed, that natives of India could not sue the Government of India. The fact was, that the Indian Government possessed no privileges of exemption from legal proceedings, and that any individual could sue the Government of India, not only in the Supreme Court, but in any subordinate Court, the same as any individual, except in the case of a political matter.

MR. ROEBUCK said, he understood that the Nawab of Surat could not sue the East India Company.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, there could be no doubt that, whenever the East India Company performed any act in its capacity of a private corporation, it was liable, like any other corporation, to be sued; but whenever the Company, as representing the British Crown, did any act —as, for example, becoming a party to a treaty—it was entirely irresponsible in any court of law. When a native Prince of India was either coerced or persuaded into a treaty with the East India Company, and when he gave up his dominions and his Sovereign power, he had no remedy in a court of justice, should he deem himself an injured party. He lost all the power of a Sovereign, and did not acquire the rights of a subject. It was a very important question, whether the revenues of the East India Company should or should not be affected by any Bill brought in without the assent of the Crown; but, as this Standing Order was altogether new, and as it could not receive that consideration at that period of the Session which it deserved, he would, if a division took place, vote against it.

MR. CARDWELL said, he thought the Order, as amended, a very wise and just Resolution. It would give to every subject of India that remedy which was now possessed in this country of appealing to the House of Commons, if he thought he had a claim on its revenues. If the rule was not merely a technical but substantially a wise and beneficial rule in this country, it was equally so with regard to India. The revenues of India were held in trust for the Crown, and he held that the charges on those revenues should be fenced about with the same checks and cautions which were thrown around the revenues of this country. The Bill relating to the Nawab of Surat, which had passed that House by a large majority, had been rejected by the House of Lords because it was introduced as a private Bill. So far, there was a denial of remedy. He should certainly support the Order.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Resolved, "That this House will not receive any Petition, or proceed upon any Motion for a Charge upon the Revenues of India, but what is recommended by the Crown."

Resolved, "That the several Standing Orders relating to Public Matters, as amended by the said Committee, be agreed to."

Ordered, "That the said Orders and Resolutions be Standing Orders of this House, and do take effect at the close of the present Session of Parliament."

Ordered, "That the Standing Orders of this House be printed."

REVIEW OF THE SESSION.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, I beg to give notice that on Thursday next, or any other time which may be more convenient to Her Majesty's Ministers, I shall call the attention of the House to the conduct of business during the present Session, and make a Motion for a Return of the Bills withdrawn during the same period.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman would make his statement on Friday. Certain business has been fixed for Thursday, and it would be more convenient to take the discussion on his Motion on the following evening.

MR. DISRAELI: Very well, Sir, I shall make my statement on Friday.

THE GERMAN LEGION—QUESTION.

MR. MURROUGH said, he would beg, in accordance with the notice he had given, to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Clerk of the Ordnance whether it was true that, although the officers of the British army at Aldershot had been required to furnish their huts at their own expense, the huts occupied by the officers of the German troops there had been furnished for them at the public expense, and, that he might be in order, he would move the adjournment of the House so that he might be enabled to make a statement with respect to recent occurrences at Aldershot. When the Foreign Enlistment Bill was brought before the House in December 1854, its opponents pointed out to the Government the deplorable consequences which would ensue from the introduction of foreign troops into the service of Her Majesty. The anticipations of those gentlemen had been fully realised. Not only had the promise of the hon. Under Secretary for War, that the men belonging to the foreign legion, when they returned from the East, would be sent to some British colony, not been fulfilled, but it was rumoured out of doors that a very high and distinguished personage—

MR. WALPOLE: Sir, I rise to order. I do not wish to stand between the hon. Member and the House, but, having given notice of his intention to put a particular question to the Government, I do not think he can continue his observations. It is true that, in order that he might make a statement, he has moved the adjournment of the House; but he is bound. I apprehend, to confine himself to showing why that Motion should be adopted; otherwise it is obvious the public business might be exposed, from time to time, to very serious and unnecessary interruptions. I appeal to you, Sir, to decide whether the hon. Member is not out of order.

MR. MURROUGH: Sir, I concur with the right hon. Gentleman that I ought to have very strong reasons for adopting the course which I have now done, and, with the permission of the House, I will proceed to state those reasons. (Cries of "Order!")

MR. SPEAKER: The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge has fairly stated what the rule of the House is—namely, that when a Member moves the adjournment of the House he ought to show some reason why the House should adjourn. The hon. Member for Bridport has not done so yet.

MR. MURROUGH: No, Sir, but I am prepared to vindicate my Motion. When assassinations have been perpetrated at Aldershot by German mercenaries—when English subjects are bleeding from the dirks of foreign hirelings—am I not justified in calling the attention of the House to the subject? The country is indignant beyond measure. It feels that these foreign troops are countenanced by those who sit in high places. (Cries of "Order!") It is all very well for hon. Gentlemen to cry "Order!" but it is our duty, as the representatives of the people, to inquire into these matters, and I am not aware that I am exceeding the privileges of debate in bringing so important a subject under the notice of the House. Sir, is it right or just that the officers of the German Legion, notwithstanding what has occurred at Aldershot and elsewhere, should have their huts furnished to them at the expense of the country?

MR. SPOONER: Sir, I rise to order. You have stated that when an hon. Member moves the adjournment of the House he is bound to give sufficient reasons why the House should adjourn. Now, can any event, however deplorable which may have happened at Aldersot, be a good reason why this House should forthwith adjourn?

MR. SPEAKER: I have not yet heard from the hon. Member for Bridport any reason why the House should adjourn. The House will see that if one hon. Member be allowed to move the adjournment of the House, and upon that Motion to make a speech relative to a totally different subject, another may adopt the same course, and it will be practically impossible to carry on the public business.

MR. MURROUGH: I think, Sir, that no business of any kind should be proceeded with until we have some statement from Her Majesty's Government on the important question which I have introduced to the notice of the House. That is the reason why I have moved the adjournment of the House. (Cries of "Order!") I am speaking to order. I have no doubt hon. Gentlemen would be extremely glad to get rid of this question; but it is one of great interest to the country and to the Government, which has placed us in this dilemma. Are the assassinations at Aldershot to be left unexplained? Are the morals of the army, and indeed of the country at large, to be corrupted by a band of German brigands?

VISCOUNT BARRINGTON: I must say, Sir, that I think the hon. Member has now given us a reason why the House should not adjourn.

MR. MURROUGH: Sir, I feel, and many hon. Members feel with me, that the time has come when we should ascertain by what or by whose influence these German troops are maintained in this free country.

COLONEL FREESTUN: Sir, I rise to order. I really think the hon. Member should not be allowed to proceed.

MR. ROEBUCK: I do not think, Sir, any good can arise from this discussion, but let us not forget the old proverb that "what is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander." Not so very long ago the hon. Member for North Northamptonshire (Mr. Stafford) having moved the adjournment of the House, proceeded to make a statement with respect to the naval review at Spithead. If he had a right to do that, I suppose the hon. Member for Bridport (Mr. Murrough) is equally entitled to make his statement, though I do not think he is adopting a very wise course.

MR. E. BALL said, he fully concurred with the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield, that the practice of the House was, on a formal Motion for the adjournment of the House, to allow statements to be made on different subjects.

MR. SPEAKER: I have no doubt that hon. Members, from time to time, have moved the adjournment of the House, in order to bring forward particular questions; but what I wish to point out to the House is, that if that practice be persevered in, it will be quite impossible to transact the public business.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I apprehend, Sir, that, if the Standing Orders were strictly enforced, any hon. Member who had moved the adjournment of the House would be compelled to confine himself to that question. Through laxity and indulgence, hon. Members are occasionally permitted to diverge to other topics; but the House will observe that the hon. Member for Bridport is doubly out of order, because he has departed not only from the rules of the House, but also from a notice which he had himself given. I am ready to answer the question which he has placed on the paper, and, seeing that the hon. Member has given another notice for to-morrow with respect to the German Legion, I hope he will defer his observations till then.

MR. MURROUGH: Sir, I hope we shall hear something more from the noble Lord than a mere answer to the question of which I have given notice. However, I have no objection to postpone my observations till to-morrow, hoping that I may then have an opportunity of making a statement to the House. Meanwhile I trust the noble Lord will answer the question as to the huts occupied by the German troops.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, I am not going to enter into the subject to which the hon. Member has adverted—namely, the unfortunate collision which has taken place between the soldiers of one regiment and those of another. The particulars of which even have not yet reached me, nor do I know who were the aggressors. I deplore the event very deeply, but it is one not altogether without example, and I am bound to say that the general conduct of the regiments belonging to the German Legion has been most exemplary, and has met with high praise from all officers—both English and foreign—who have witnessed it. I now proceed to the question of the hon. Member itself. When the German Legion was stationed at Shorncliffe it was intended that it should remain there only a short time; and when it was removed to Aldershot, our intention was that it should stay there only until measures were taken for its final disposal—measures which, I trust, will very shortly be carried into execution. The hut furniture supplied to a British officer, as I am informed, consists of two chairs, a table, and fireirons. Anything beyond that he finds for himself. When the

Viscount Palmerston

German Legion was stationed at Shorncliffe, an application was made for an additional indulgence in the shape of a soldier's bed and mattress. It so happened that at that time there was a quantity of those articles in store, and considering that the German troops were to remain at Shorncliffe only for a short period, they were provided with a number of them. On their removal to Aldershot the same indulgence was continued to them for the same reason—that their stay in camp was to be only temporary; I certainly do not think that the House will consider that that is an indulgence calling for any animadversion.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he wished to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in the opinion of the Government, the troops composing the Foreign Legion were available for garrison or for active duty within the United Kingdom?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, the Act of Parliament which authorised Her Majesty's Government to raise foreign troops allowed them to bring into this country a certain number of these troops for the purposes of drill and organisation; but it was never contemplated that they should, while here, be employed in any manner in which troops might unfortunately be required to act. I have no hesitation in stating that these German troops are in this country simply as in a resting-place until measures, which are in contemplation, shall be taken for their disbandment: and although I trust that, in the present state of the country, it is utterly out of the question to suppose that any troops can be required for any such purposes as those to which the hon. Gentleman refers, I may add, that undoubtedly no foreign troops would, under any circumstances, be so employed.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he wished to know if he was to understand that none of those foreign troops were to be available for garrison or for active duty in this country?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: They are not in garrison; they are encamped; and they must be somewhere.

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, he wished to ask whether some of those foreign troops had not been in garrison at Dover Castle?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: During the war they occupied a barrack at Dover, where they had been assembled for the purpose of training.

COAL EXPLOSION IN GLAMORGANSHIRE
—QUESTION.

MR. CAYLEY said, he would beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he intended to employ any special means to ascertain the real circumstances under which the disastrous loss of 110 lives had just taken place, from an explosion in a coal mine in Glamorganshire. The report stated 110 lives, but he had since been informed that 120 lives had been lost.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he had received an account of the unfortunate accident in question, both from the coroner and the inspector of the district. The coroner stated that the inspector was on the spot two hours after the occurrence had taken place, and that he rendered very valuable assistance in the prosecution of the subsequent inquiry. But he added, that in the then state of the coal pit, and amidst the excitement naturally consequent on the calamity, it was impossible its cause could at once be thoroughly investigated, and the inquest had therefore been adjourned to the 28th instant. The inspector wrote to say that, considering the extent of the calamity, in which it appeared that 114 lives had been lost, he wished to have the assistance of two other inspectors in watching the inquiry; and he (Sir G. Grey) had accordingly directed that that assistance should be given. A thorough and searching investigation would take place.

CRIMINAL APPROPRIATION OF TRUST
PROPERTY BILL—QUESTION.

MR. HADFIELD said, he wished to ask the hon. and learned Attorney General whether he intended to proceed this Session with the Criminal Appropriation of Trust Property Bill?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he was glad to find the hon. Gentleman had put a question which afforded an opportunity of stating what were his views with respect to that Bill. When he had first obtained the consent of the House to the introduction of a measure for the amendment of the law in reference to the criminal appropriation of trust property he had hoped to go on with it and to pass it in the course of the present Session. But he found that the Master of the Rolls and some others of the Equity Judges were of opinion that the Bill, as it had been introduced, might be productive of considerable mischief, inasmuch as it would enable trustees who had been guilty of fraudulent malversation to shelter themselves by refusing to give evidence before the Courts on the ground that they did not wish, and that they could not be required to criminate themselves. In consequence of the representations which had thus been addressed to him upon the subject, he had hesitated to go on with the measure. But on the other hand, he had been very strongly pressed by many of the leading practitioners in the Court of Chancery to see whether he could not overcome that difficulty. After having further considered the subject, he had, he hoped, framed a Bill which would meet the objection he had stated. He now proposed to take away from trustees, who were called upon to answer in a Court of Chancery, the privilege of sheltering themselves under the plea of crimination, and to give them instead the same security as was possessed by bankers and others who were charged with the fraudulent appropriation of securities—namely, that if under the pressure of the Court they disclosed transactions in which they had been concerned, they should not, in respect of such disclosure, be subject to a criminal proceeding. With the introduction of such a provision, he hoped to be able to propose a measure which should put an end to the fraudulent appropriation of trust property. It would be too late, however, to carry such a Bill in the present Session, and he should therefore propose it early in the Session of 1857.

LOSS OF THE "EUROPA"—QUESTION.

CAPTAIN ARCHDALL said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, it having been announced by the Secretary of State for the Home Department that the Government would take into consideration the question of erecting some permanent memorial to the gallantry and self-devotion of the officers and men who were lost in Her Majesty's ship Birkenhead in February, 1852, the Government will not at the same time consider the propriety of erecting a monument to the memory of Colonel Willoughby Moore and the non-commissioned officers and men of the Enniskillen Dragoons, who lost their lives by the burning of the Europa transport ship on their passage to the seat of war in the spring of 1854? He wished to direct the attention of the noble Lord to the melancholy circumstances attending the loss of the Europa, and the noble and heroic conduct displayed by Colonel Moore and the Enniskillen Dragoons on that occasion, Colonel Moore refusing to leave the ship, though almost forced to do so, until the last man of his regiment had been saved.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, that Her Majesty's Government were perfectly disposed to commemorate by some permanent memorial that other act to which the hon. and gallant Member had referred, in which a number of British troops had afforded a splendid example of the indomitable courage and the heroic self-possession which had always distinguished our gallant national defenders.

THE CRIMEAN REPORT.

The Report of the Board of General Officers which sat at Chelsea, to inquire into certain charges contained against various officers in the Report of Sir John M'Neill and Colonel Tulloch, was brought up by—

MR. C. P. VILLIERS, who said: In moving, Sir, that these papers be laid upon the table of the House, I will ask leave to notice a statement of an extraordinary character that I am informed has been made in another place, with respect to this Report in connection with myself. I am told that a noble Lord, in complaining that the Report had not been laid upon the table sooner, ascribed the delay to the fact that I had drawn the Report, and that I had been dilatory in the matter for the purpose of serving the objects of the Minister of War. Now, Sir, the reason why I do not believe that this noble Lord has been correctly reported is, that if he made such a statement it is impossible for any man to have uttered a more unmitigated untruth; and I cannot, therefore, believe that the noble Lord has been correctly reported. I beg to state that I never drew the Report, and I never delayed its presentation to Parliament. The general officers drew their own conclusions from the evidence submitted to them, and were quite competent to do so; and I did not delay the presentation of the Report—because I had no power to do so if I had wished it, and I had no object or interest whatever in doing so. I do not believe that anybody deserving the least respect has ever offered any reason for supposing that I had done so. The noble Lord has been in constant communication with persons who have been connected with this inquiry, and I do not believe that anybody of the least authority has given him this information. He has not obtained it from Lord Hardinge, with whom he has been in frequent communication of late about a portion of these proceedings, for Lord Hardinge knows that all this noble Lord is reported to have said of me is unfounded in fact. Neither has the noble Lord had it from Sir Alexander Woodford, for I have applied to him to know if he considered that what was reported to have been said by this noble Lord was true, and whether he thought that, by any accident, anything could have been said or done by the Board that could have led the noble Lord into error. Sir Alexander Woodford's reply was that, as far as the Board was concerned, it was a gratuitous mistake, for it was perfectly untrue that I had ever wished or attempted to postpone the completion of the Report, and that nothing that had been said at or by the Board could for a moment justify such a thing being said; that the General officers had finished their Report as soon as they were able, and that they were much indebted for the assistance that had been rendered them from the Judge Advocate's office. The noble Lord could not have learned it from Lord Beauchamp, who that noble Lord had probably forgotten was in the same House as himself; for he rose, after the noble Lord had spoken, and, like a man of honour and a Gentleman, refuted the calumnies which he heard unjustly uttered against an absent person. I do not, Sir, therefore, know where the noble Lord got his information from, if he is correctly reported. It is further reported that this noble Lord imputed to me partiality during the conduct of the inquiry, and that I had abused the authority with which I was invested, in order to prejudice him. Sir, I think this House will support me in saying that I should degrade myself, as well as the office that I have the honour to hold, if I were to descend to notice such a charge. The proceedings were—fortunately for me—public; and that portion of the public who attended in the Court was able to judge of the conduct and demeanour of all those who were parties to the proceedings, and I hope the noble Lord is as ready as myself to abide by their judgment. The noble Lord complains that the inquiry was political in its character, owing to the circumstance of the Judge Advocate General being a Minister and attending the Court. Sir, so totally opposed is this to the fact, that I solemnly declare that I never, during the whole inquiry, asked or heard what were the politics of the general officers who composed the Board and of which I knew nothing, with the exception of the three who were in Parliament; but since the noble Lord has made this assertion I have inquired, and have been credibly informed that every one of the general officers is of the same political party as the noble Lord himself. Besides that, Sir, there was a gentleman who acted as private secretary to Sir Alexander Woodford, who was in the room the whole time when the doors were closed, who, as I believe, was a private friend, and, as I know, was a strong political partisan of the noble Lord, so that in that respect he had everything in his favour: and the noble Lord's judges, they who tried him, and who judged and acquitted him, were his own political partisans. But I hope, sir, I may not be misunderstood to imply that therefore they were actuated in the smallest degree by political motives. I should be ashamed of myself if I imputed this motive to them, because I am satisfied it would be untrue. I believe the general officers gave a careful, anxious, and honest consideration to the evidence which was submitted to them; and I believe that they did what, as judges, they were bound to do,—namely, decide upon the evidence that was laid before them; and I am bound to say I believe that, however incomplete the inquiry and insufficient the evidence may have been in Lord Lucan's case, yet the general officers, looking to what evidence they had to decide upon, have given a just verdict. For what purpose, therefore, the noble Lord wants to discredit the inquiry by casting these imputations upon those who have not injured him I cannot say—I have considered it a duty to myself to notice them, and I trust the House, when they consider that there is no other way, for a Member of this House to meet such charges than to refute them here as publicly as they have been made elsewhere, will consider me excused for having, in my own defence, intruded these observations upon them.

Chelsea, I have not the slightest hesitation in expressing my opinion that the charge adverted to by the right hon. and learned Gentleman as made by a noble Lord in another place, is perfectly unfair and unfounded. So far from the right hon. and learned Gentleman having been influenced by political feelings, or having attempted to interfere with the opinion of the Board of General Officers, I can safely assert that I know of no inquiry which has ever been conducted with less reference to political feeling. For my own part, with the exception of those three Members of the Board who have seats in this House and in the other House of Parliament, and whose political principles may therefore be assumed to be known, I have not the slightest idea what political views were entertained by the Members of the Board, and I am certain that all were men of far too high a sense of honour to have allowed themselves to be actuated by political principles in giving judgment on the professional conduct of a brother officer. The position of the right hon. and learned Gentleman, as regarded his relation to the Board, may have been an anomalous one; and the question may arise as to what position the Judge Advocate should hold in relation to the Court in inquiries of a similar character; but I can only say—and I am sure that I express the feelings of the whole of the Board—that I am at a loss for language sufficiently powerful to express the opinion of the advantage which the Board derived from the assistance of the right hon. and learned Gentleman.

COLONEL FRENCH said, he thought it was very inconvenient that a statement should be made in that House in reply to a charge made in the other House of Parliament. He himself had had no communication with his noble Friend Lord Lucan, but he felt certain that if he had made a wrong statement he would be ready frankly and fairly to withdraw it.

Subject dropped.

Order for Third Reading read.

MR. SPOONER said, he wished to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Board of Trade to what appeared to him to be a defect in the measure. Under the 17th clause, as he understood it, a joint contractor who had been proceeded against by a creditor, and who had paid the sum required of him, could not recover from one of his partners more than that partner's original share of the liabilities, although the other partners should have become bankrupts; so that if there had been four partners, and if one had paid the debt, he could not recover more than one-fourth of its amount from one of the other three, in case the two others should have become bankrupts.

MR. LOWE said, that the Bill had been carefully considered in the other House; and all he could state was, that he had been informed the clause in question would not have the effect attributed to it by the hon. Gentleman.

Bill read 3^o, and passed.

JOINT-STOCK BANKS BILL.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the Third time."

MR. VANCE said, he objected to that provision in the Bill under which it would not be necessary that a certain number of directors should annually retire. By such a retirement, which was enforced in many banks, a great safeguard against fraud was afforded to the shareholders; and he believed that with such a safeguard the late frauds in the Tipperary Bank could never have been committed. He should, therefore, move that the Bill should be read a third time that day three months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."

MR. ROEBUCK said, he thought the best course the Legislature could pursue in that case was to let shareholders decide for themselves whether or not they should re-elect any Director. They must look to their own vigilance for their own security against fraud on the part of the Directors, and it would surely be unwise to prevent them from continuing their confidence in any particular individual.

Question put, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes 92; Noes 12: Majority 80.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read 3^o, and passed.

THE INDIAN BUDGET.

MR. VERNON SMITH moved, that the House resolve itself into a Committee on the East India revenue accounts.

MR. I. BUTT said, he rose, pursuant to notice, to call attention to the petition of his Highness Meer Ali Moorad (presented 27th June), and to submit a Motion on the subject of the confiscation of his revenues and territories by the Indian Government. He was very unwilling to interfere with the right hon. Gentleman, and prevent him from going into Committee, but in order to keep his observations strictly in order, he intended to move as an Amendment, "That the House resolve itself into a Committee to consider how far the possessions confiscated from the petitioner form a portion of the East India revenues." He submitted such an Amendment was perfectly in order.

MR. SPEAKER said, that the Motion before the House was not a Motion for going into a Committee of Supply, and therefore the hon. and learned Gentleman was not in order in bringing forward a case of grievance to a particular individual.

MR. I. BUTT said, the petition he had presented complained of a matter affecting the revenues of India, and the House was asked to go into Committee to consider the revenues of India; he contended, therefore, that he had a right to ask the House to consider how far those revenues were derived from property that had been taken from the petitioner.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, that the object of going into Committee was to enable his right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Control, to make a statement as to the revenues of India, and how they were applied. The matter brought forward by the hon. and learned Member was an individual grievance, which might be made the subject of a special Motion, but had no immediate connection with the business of the Committee.

MR. I. BUTT said, he would give way if the noble Lord would promise him Thursday for his Motion. He thought he was quite in order in stating the grounds on which he considered his Amendment to be regular.

MR. FITZROY said, he rose to order. It was not competent for a Member to argue a point of Order when Mr. Speaker had declared his proceeding was not in order.

MR. I. BUTT said, he would submit to Mr. Speaker that he was entitled to proceed.

MR. SPEAKER, the hon. and learned Gentleman certainly was not in order.

Motion agreed to.

House in Committee.

EAST INDIA COMPANY'S REVENUE ACCOUNTS—STATEMENT ON INDIAN AFFAIRS.

MR. VERNON SMITH, in rising to make the annual official statement relative to the affairs of India, said that the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Butt) laboured under a misapprehension if he supposed that the Committee into which the House had just resolved itself was about to dispose of the revenues of India. The object of the Committee was a totally different one. During the discussion of the Act of 1853 it was felt desirable that some notice should be periodically taken in that House of the general subject of Indian affairs, and it was thought that the best mode of doing so would be by the person who filled the office of President of the Board of Control every Session submitting a statement of the finances of India, on which occasion any hon. Gentleman who wished to make any complaint, or to offer any observations connected with the administration of that distant empire, would have an opportunity of addressing the House. Nothing could be further from his desire than to preclude any case of grievance from being fairly brought under discussion; he wished the natives of India to know that the doors of Parliament were opened wide to them; yet the hon. and learned Member for Youghal must be aware that if his Motion had been entertained before the House went into Committee, the effect would have been to get rid of what was termed the Indian budget for the present year; for it was not in his power, any more than it was in that of the hon. and learned Gentleman, to command another day for such a purpose. When he last addressed the House, on a similar occasion, he moved a series of Resolutions analogous to those submitted by his predecessor; but the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Bright) then moved an additional set of Resolutions, embodying the opinion of many hon. Members, that there should be some acceleration in the production of the Indian accounts, and also that the official statement on Indian affairs should be made at an earlier period of the year. While alluding to the hon. Member for Manchester, he must be permitted to express his deep regret at the absence of that hon. Gentleman, and more especially at the cause of that absence; for the presence of a man of such vigorous mind, and one so well capable of discussing Indian affairs, in which he had interested himself from a single desire to promote the welfare of his fellow subjects, of whatever colour or clime, would be always of valuable service to him (Mr. Vernon Smith), and, he believed, also to the House. The loss of the assistance of that eminent debater was all the more to be deplored, looking at the number of empty benches which the House now presented. With one part of the hon. Gentleman's Resolutions he had been unable strictly to comply. Although the season of the year was not now so late as when he last made his statement, the period of the Session at which it was delivered was nearly the same in both cases. For that, however, he was not to blame. If the House came to a Resolution in one year, it ought to be prepared to enforce it in the next. The reason why it had not done so was doubtless because it gave the precedence over Indian affairs to the more exciting as well as more pressing questions of foreign policy, the negotiations for peace, and after peace had been proclaimed the urgency of domestic subjects. He had, however, been successful in fulfilling that part of the Resolution which enjoined on him the production of the Indian accounts at an earlier period than heretofore. His exertions in this respect had been seconded by the Court of Directors, and the local Governments had also responded to the whip made upon them with zeal and promptitude. The result was, that the accounts were presented on the 13th of March, instead of on the 18th of May, which had put the House in possession of the state of the entire finances of India two months earlier than usual. Together with the figures for the years 1853-4 and 1855-6 the sketch estimates for 1856-7 had been furnished to the Home Government—the greatest amount of progress ever yet made in the production of these accounts; and indeed he could not see how, with the sketch estimates of the coming year before them, they could well carry their anticipations of prospective revenue and expenditure much further into the future. For this improvement credit might, therefore, fairly be claimed. He would now read to the House the figures on which he founded the Resolutions that he intended to move, together with a comparison of the sketch estimates for 1856-7 with the actual accounts for 1853-4. For 1853-4 the figures were—

That statement showed that his anticipation last year of the deficiency which would occur had fortunately not been fulfilled. He would now inform the House of the results of the Indian finances from 1852 to 1856. From 1852-3 there was a surplus revenue of £424,257. In 1853-4 there was a deficit of £2,044,117. In 1854-5 the estimated deficit was £2,670,518, but the actual accounts showed a deficit of only £1,708,627. The improvement in that year, amounting to £961,891, arose from increase of revenue to the amount of £615,837; diminution of Indian charge, £344,722; and diminution of home charge, £1,332. The estimated deficit in 1855-6 was £2,057,633, and in 1856-7, £1,152,109, which was much below the amount anticipated. He would now explain to the House the cause of this result. The House was aware that one of the principal items of expenditure in India was under the head of public works. It had been said that the entire deficiency in the Indian finances was caused by the amount of money expended upon public works, but that statement had, he thought, been disproved. He had certainly been inclined last year to over estimate the expenditure under this head, but he had since taken pains to ascertain the real state of the case, and with the assistance of one of the most intelligent accountants in his own, or, he believed, in any other public office (Mr. Leach), a statement had been prepared which would put the House in full possession of the facts. In order to ascertain what was the real expenditure upon public works he had directed that the statement should be confined to such expenditure as was incurred for works which could be fairly considered remunerative, for he thought a great mistake had been made, especially in Mr. Grant's Minute, so much alluded to last year, in taking into the account of public works expenditure upon repairs and matters of that kind, which were the ordinary incidents of an empire, as they were of an estate. The statement he had prepared was confined to reproductive public works, including improvements on military stations, for he considered that an outlay on barracks which promoted the health of the soldiers, and so contributed to a saving of valuable lives, was even in a pecuniary point of view fully justifiable. The right hon. Gentleman then proceeded to read the following statement:—

Results of the Indian Finances in 1854–55, and as estimated for 1855–56 and 1856–57, showing the effect upon those Results of the Extraordinary Expenditure on Public Works above the average of former years:—

The expenditure upon public works had, in fact, been the chief cause of the very considerable deficiency which existed, but it was consolatory to know that, but for such expenditure, there would have been an actual surplus of revenue. Before quitting the subject of public works, he must observe that he had yielded, as much as any one, to the excitement which existed in this country after the inquiry of the Committee, in 1852, as to the necessity of encouraging great public works in India; but he regretted that this notion had been pressed forward too eagerly, and had not been undertaken more gradually. The consequence of the excitement to which he referred was, that there arose throughout India an outcry for every description of public work. Letters were sent round to almost all engineers and other officials employed on such works, a stimulus was applied to the promotion of undertakings of that kind, and ill-digested plans, as well as those which had been carefully considered, were carried out. He might mention, in proof of his statement, that a proposal was submitted to the Government for the construction of a road from Lahore to Peshawur, at an expense of £4,000 a mile, or about half the expense of a railroad, and a railway was now projected over nearly the same ground. The operations for the construction of the road had been, to a certain extent, checked; but he mentioned the circumstance to show the inconvenience of commencing such enterprises without due consideration. One of the most important items in the Indian revenue was the salt duty. The duty imposed upon salt had frequently been brought under the consideration of the House by the right hon. Member for Droitwich (Sir J. Pakington), who had, however, exercised great forbearance this Session. The right hon. Gentleman had last Session called for a Report on the subject of the salt trade, which he had not yet received. That delay was partly owing to the illness of the gentleman employed to make the Report. It had now come to hand; and, though the statements and recommendations in it had not yet received the sanction of the local Government, and still less that of the Imperial Government, every one who read it must admit that it was a most able and valuable Report. He would read only a portion of the conclusion of it to the House—

“ It has for years—since August, 1748—been open to any to engage in the manufacture of salt according to the English method, under Excise regulations. The only remaining question is whether it is possible to introduce any system of Excise effectively where the common native process of manufacture is adopted. This question is now in course of practical solution. The Bengal Government, with the full concurrence of the Government of India, sanctioned, in September, 1854, a set of rules for granting licences to parties desirous of engaging in the manufacture of salt, upon any method, under an excise system; so that, in fact, in Bengal a system of excise has been in course of substitution for the monopoly arrangements for more than a year past. The whole correspondence on the subject will be found in the Appendix, and it appears to me that all that is necessary is to push on the present scheme through all the salt-producing districts, as far as it depends upon the authorities to do so. I am of opinion that the duty should at once be lowered from its present amount of 2 rupees 8 annas to 2 rupees per maund, the rate which prevails in the North-Western Provinces, the special additional duty of 8 annas, levied on the Allahabad line of those provinces, for the protection of the Bengal revenue, being, of course, discontinued at the same time. I entirely agree with the Board of Revenue, that by so considerable a reduction there would be a much greater probability of the price being at once reduced to the consumer, and a stimulus in consequence given to consumption, than if only a 4 annas abatement were made, as heretofore. I am not at all sure that it might not be ultimately and speedily beneficial to the revenue if the rate throughout the Bengal Presidency and the Punjab were at once reduced to 1 rupee 8 annas per maund, being double the rate prevailing in the Bombay and Madras Presidencies.

The proposal here made was a very moderate one; but he wished it to be understood that it was the proposal of the gentleman only who was appointed to draw up the Report. The Committee was aware that a very large—indeed, the largest portion of the Indian revenues was derived from land. There had always been considerable difficulty in saying how we should deal with the land revenue of India—it was a subject which had puzzled the greatest philosophers and statesmen; but he believed it was the general opinion that throughout the Madras Presidency it would be necessary to have a survey and fresh assessment, and that nothing effectual could be done till that survey was completed. In the meantime Lord Harris had not been insensible to the evils of a too heavy assessment, and he had expressed a desire that a reduction in many instances should take place. The line which Lord Harris had taken on this subject would be best explained by the following memorandum—

“His Lordship had no doubt that if the Government demand was fixed at 25 per cent, or one-fourth of the gross produce, ‘not only would that be no loss to the general income, but that there would be in a short time a large addition to it by the large quantity of land which would be taken into cultivation, and by the increased consumption of articles of import, both of which would be caused by the accumulation of capital.’ But that the actual loss or gain to Government will be only known after the survey has been made and the assessment fixed; in the meantime, Lord Harris was ‘disposed to think that the general out-turn would be far from unfavourable to Government.’ It would appear that the Madras Government calculated that with four deputy surveyors general, the survey, &c., of the Madras Presidency ‘will occupy twenty-two years, and that its cost will amount to 38,40,000 rupees, but that if the scale of operations is enlarged the period occupied will be shortened, and the total cost will be diminished.’ The papers connected with the proposed general survey of the Madras Presidency were submitted to the Government of India for orders, &c. It appears that that Government had informed Lord Harris of their ‘unanimous’ concurrence with the views and proposals of the Madras Government.”

He believed the best authorities concurred in thinking that without a new survey and assessment it would be difficult to bring about an increase in the land revenue. It was satisfactory to find, however, that they were also of opinion, and Lord Harris among the number, that a reduction of the assessment would have the effect of increasing the revenue. Last year he mentioned that, among the productions of India, there was some hope of finding coal and iron. In doing so, he was guided very much by what had appeared in the Indian papers; but he was happy to find that the statement was corroborated by the opinion of Lord Dalhousie, who counted upon a valuable and abundant supply of both being obtained at no distant date. He need hardly say that if those important minerals were found in abundance in India, they would have an extraordinary effect in facilitating and accelerating the progress of that empire. There was another exceedingly valuable article of growth and manufacture in India to which he would for a moment advert, and that was cotton. Everybody could see the importance of securing from India a large supply of cotton, and he was happy to say that to a certain extent the experiments which had been made had proved successful. He would read to the Committee a note with which he had been furnished on the results of the cotton experimental cultivation in the Bombay Presidency with the New Orleans seed:—

“With the exception of the Dharwar Collectorate the endeavours of the Government to induce the ryots to cultivate the New Orleans seed has not been successful; indeed, in Ahmedabad, Surat, Broach, and other cotton districts, the American plant is reported to have been entirely neglected, or the quantity grown quite insignificant. However, the area cultivated with the indigenous plant was, in 1854-5, in excess of that of 1853-4 in most of the cotton districts. In Dharwar, in 1854-5, the acres cultivated with the New Orleans seed were 63,298, against 41,403 acres in 1853-4, showing an increased cultivation in the former year of 21,895 acres; and apparently the ryots are now so convinced of the advantages of engaging in this cultivation that the American plant may be fairly said to have taken permanent root in this district, and that the indigenous cotton will have to give place to it. Therefore, under these circumstances, interference or aid from the Government to induce ryots to undertake the American cotton culture was no longer required in Dharwar, while in the other cotton districts encouragement on the part of the Government had not led to results of any consequence, or was likely to produce any permanent effect. Moreover, there are now scattered over the country Europeans prepared to purchase cotton, either of the American or native variety, of a quality suited to the English market, at remunerating prices. And further, it would appear that the prejudices of the ryots to the cotton saw-gin for cleaning the cotton was giving way, and that the use of it was becoming popular, as the ryots found that saw-ginned cotton obtained from the merchants a higher price than the cotton cleaned and prepared by the churka or native foot-roller; and that the work was done more speedily with the saw-gin than the churka, and full as cheap."

"Mr. Landon, a merchant, who has settled in Broach for cotton purposes, has established in that district a factory for making and preparing the saw-gin machinery. He has also erected a cotton factory—an experiment which appears to have been attended with signal success. For, it is stated, the yarns made at Mr. Landon's factory, 'exclusively of short staple Broach cotton,' fetched in the market 'nearly 10 per cent more than Manchester yarn of the same designation;' and that orders had in consequence been received sufficiently to keep the factory in constant work for some months."

Again, he was sorry that the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Bright) was not in his place, as he had ever taken a deep interest in this question, and would, no doubt, have been gratified to learn that something was doing towards increasing the cultivation of an article the production of which he had been most anxious to promote. He was not aware that there was anything further in the statement of the revenues of India which he need comment upon. He would only say that he saw nothing to lead them to despair of an increase in the revenue; but, at the same time, it was their duty also to look to other means of producing a surplus—viz., to a reduction in the amount of expenditure. It had been said that it was impossible to lay on fresh taxes in India. He was not so very certain of that, for on looking round he thought there might be found other things than now existed on which taxes might be raised. But, in the meantime, they had to look to the expenditure. The first great head of expenditure was the Indian army, and he would at once say on this point that it was next to impossible to suppose that they could effect any material reduction in that army. It had been said that a reduction might be made in the way of employing the native army more and the Queen's troops less. Now, he maintained it was necessary that a large proportion of Queen's troops should be kept up in India, and particularly that to substitute Indian cavalry for the Queen's cavalry was a proposal totally inadmissible. He believed that the presence of British cavalry in India was attended with a very wholesome effect; that they were exceedingly useful in promoting the rivalry, in teaching the Indian cavalry lessons of discipline, and exciting them to those habits of order and obedience which were of so much consequence to an army. He was happy to find that the first representation which he had the honour to make to Her Majesty on the subject of the Indian army had been received with great approbation. The Governor General said:—

"The Indian army, however, has still higher cause for congratulating itself on the gracious favour which the Sovereign has lately shown towards it, in raising its officers from the derogatory position in which they have hitherto stood, and in granting to them the recognition which until now has been denied to them, of their military rank in every part of the British dominions, and throughout the world."

Having received that compliment, it would be ungracious in the Indian army to wish to have withdrawn from them the presence of the Queen's troops. There were other questions relating to the Indian army, such as the substitution in greater numbers than at present of irregular for regular cavalry, which were still under the consideration of the Indian Government. He hoped that no hurried decision would be come to upon them. Reductions might be made in the Commissariat, the stud, and other departments; but to reduce in times of tranquillity to too low a scale was a mistake which he trusted would be avoided in dealing with the expenditure of the Indian army. He now came to the civil service. At a former period of the Session he was reported to have said, in reply to the Member for Devonport, that he thought the civil service in India ought to be reduced to the footing of the different colonial services. He never made any such statement. All he said was, that the civil salaries of India had remained almost stationary, while those of the Colonies had been very much diminished. He thought that the Indian civil servants ought to be highly paid, and that the best men ought to be enticed thereby to go out, but he did not admit that the Indian civil service was the only service which required a man to go to a distant and unhealthy country, and which sent him home jaded and worn out. The climate of the West Indies and many other places was, in some respects, as bad as that of India. On the other hand, the salaries of the Indian civil service were upon a scale far beyond that which existed in any other profession. He knew of no other service in which a young man of twenty could enter at £350, or in which a person could rise from £350 to £4000 per annum; but let it not be supposed that he desired anything to be done immediately in the way of reducing the civil salaries of India. To touch existing interests would be the worst possible economy, even if it were not unjust; but it would be the duty of the Indian Government to keep the advantages of reduction always in view, and to reap them whenever practicable. Reduction, it was said, would be followed by peculation. He did not believe it. Lord William Bentinck made great reductions in his time, and no ill ensued. In the worst times of Indian peculation and corruption salaries or allowances from trade were high enough. Economy was a most offensive virtue everywhere, but especially in India. Financial reformers had in England the support of the House of Commons and the public press; whereas in India the only public opinion was that of the civil service itself, which was naturally averse from a reduction of its own salaries. It might be said, indeed, that the only person whose duty it was to preach economy was the unfortunate officer who bore the title of President of the Board of Control. He was glad to state, however, that in June a despatch was sent out recommending very considerable reductions and—which at the same time touched another subject of great importance, allowing public loans to be contracted for public works to the extent of £1,000,000 for the next two years. It was to be hoped that the contents of that despatch would obviate the necessity of sending out an accountant to India. A system of audit already existed there, and the proposal to establish a separate audit here would require the most attentive consideration, because it in fact took the power from the Indian Government and placed it in other hands. Having thus gone through the revenue and expenditure of India he should now proceed to describe the political position of that country at the present moment. Since his statement last year some disturbances had occurred in India. At that time, speaking upon the authority of the Governor General, he declared that the whole of India was tranquil. He believed he might repeat the same statement now, because in India temporary effervescences could not fairly be said to disturb the general tranquillity of the empire. But it so happened, curiously enough, that at the moment he was speaking last year an extraordinary species of insurrection—known as the Santal rebellion—was in the act of breaking out. To some extent that insurrection showed negligence on the part of the authorities of India. If there had been a proper police, or if the authorities had been warned by certain circumstances which must have attracted the attention of sagacious men, the Santal insurrection might have been anticipated and instantly quelled. An ample report upon the cause of the insurrection had been received from India, and the Court of Directors had written a despatch, stating their views upon it. Mr. Bidwell, the late Commissioner in the Santal districts, who took great pains to ascertain the cause of the Santal outbreak, was of opinion that the primary cause was the great dissatisfaction of the tribe on account of the oppressive exactions of the mahajans, or money-lenders, and the corruption of the naib-sezawals (police-officers and collectors of the land tax), and in some places oppression on the part of the railway employés, and the little check they received from the Government authorities. The Government of India considered that the outbreak was caused by the want of early attention to the complaints of the Santals, of the oppressions they suffered from the mahajans (native revenue and police officers) and zemindars; and in one instance the Lieutenant Governor considered that they had been ill-used by a railway official. The local officers were greatly blamed. The above appeared to have been the exciting causes of the rebellion, fanned by religious fanaticism—the leaders making their followers believe that they were accompanied by an incarnate deity, under whose orders they acted. Although some few instances of that insurrection had been more recently reported, it was believed that the great body of the Santals were settling down peaceably and quietly. The country had been declared a non-regulation province, and had been placed under the control of a Commissioner, with a deputy Commissioner and four assistants. These officers were vested with judicial powers, and would administer speedy justice to the Santals, who would thus be relieved from the oppressive exactions of the mahajans, police and revenue officers, and zemindars. A new police force was under organisation, and until that was efficient, two regiments of infantry and one of irregular cavalry would remain in the Santal territory. The Santals were not to possess warlike weapons without authority, but were to be employed upon the public works, and paid for their labour. Stores of grain and salt were to be prepared for the destitute Santals, and the payment of the rent was to be thrown over three years. These were supposed to be the causes and remedies of the Santal insurrection, which was an outbreak the more extraordinary, seeing that the Santals had been always regarded as a most quiet and inoffensive race. The next point to which he must advert was the mission to Ava. That mission had not been successful to the extent of obtaining a treaty with Ava, which Lord Dalhousie did not greatly regret; but the reception which we had met with there was everything that could be desired; great honour had been shown us, and the mission had resulted in bringing about that description of friendship which was much wanted between the States. Another point of very considerable importance, to which he had alluded last year, had reference to our relations with Persia. Independently of anything that had occurred in the shape of a diplomatic rupture with Persia, the Persians had, it appeared, thought themselves justified in marching upon Herat. It was not quite clear, from the accounts which had been received—such was the confusion of histories and relations—whether they had been able to occupy Herat. He believed that the Affghans would be so unwilling to allow the Persians to enter Herat that they would themselves repel them; and as Dost Mahomed had obtained possession of Candahar, he would be able, if he liked to attack the Persians in Herat,

to repulse them. It was quite impossible that this country should allow the Persians to obtain possession of Herat. By an engagement which they had entered into in 1853 with the English Envoy, they bound themselves not to interfere in the affairs of Afghanistan; and, therefore, if it were true that they had gone to besiege Herat, they had distinctly violated their engagement with this country, and it was clear that we could not allow our treaties to be trampled upon and our honour to be insulted with impunity. If the Persians, therefore, did not retire from Herat some means must be taken to vindicate British honour and to expel them from that place. In making his present statement he must not omit reference to one of the most important events which had taken place in regard to our Indian Empire—he meant the acquisition of the kingdom of Oude. He had presented, nearly two months since, the whole of the papers upon that subject, and as no Member of either House had thought proper to notice it, he presumed that there was a general consent in the opinion that the acquisition of Oude was a reasonable achievement for Lord Dalhousie to accomplish. Should such not be the opinion, he should be perfectly prepared at any time to defend that step, but at present he should only state the cause of the transaction, and the motives of the Government. Lord Dalhousie, finding from the statements of repeated Governors General, including Lord Wellesley, Lord W. Bentinck, and Lord Hardinge, that the position of Oude was derogatory to the dignity and credit of the Indian Government, and that the different schemes which they had tried one after the other had failed to effect such an improvement as was desired, determined, after eight years' glorious government in India, not to leave that country with Oude in the condition in which he had found it. In consequence, in July last he sent a letter to the Court of Directors, stating his views upon the subject; and that letter, which was backed by unanimous minutes from all his Council, reached this country at the end of September. The persons who coincided in Lord Dalhousie's opinion were the men of all others whose principle was opposed to all aggression upon native princes, who were commonly known as the advocates of government by native rulers rather than of the system of annexation, and among them were General Sleeman, General Outram, and General Low. All the authorities that could be gathered together agreed that Lord Dalhousie was justified in the view which he took of that transaction. Lord Dalhousie having sent home those reports, the Government did not act upon them immediately, although the pressure was great, because Lord Dalhousie was then about to retire from India. A month or six weeks were spent by the Court of Directors and the Board of Control in consideration. At length, having regard to the prudence and ability which Lord Dalhousie had exhibited during his rule in India, Her Majesty's Government determined to point out to him to some extent what they considered would be the best course to pursue, while at the same time they left an ample discretion in his hands. Lord Dalhousie's conduct proved that the Government had been well justified in placing that confidence in him, because the moment that the power was conferred on the noble Lord he took what he (Mr. Vernon Smith) regarded as a most manly course. He called it a manly course, because it would really have savoured only of hypocrisy to deal in any other way with that unfortunate monarch—unfortunate from his own vices and debaucheries. He (Mr. Vernon Smith) was very indifferent whether that transaction were designated as an annexation, an acquisition, or a cession; but he denied that the Government had any general policy of annexation, if by that were meant the grasping of everything which came within arm's reach. Such was not the annexation of Oude. Men might approve the annexation of Oude and condemn that of Pegu and Nagpore, for each case stood upon distinctive features of its own. He had heard people say that we had no more right to annex Oude than the Emperor of Russia had to annex Turkey; but Russia was not responsible for what took place in Turkey, while we were responsible for what occurred in Oude. For whatever mischief happened within our ken in the East, and which it was in our power to suppress, we were held to be liable; and therefore every evil which existed in Oude, under the eyes of our President, to which it was thought we could put an end, was not unreasonably imputed to our charge. It would not do to hold one morality at Calcutta and another at Lucknow—to say that what was good in one place was bad in another, or vice versa; and he was perfectly prepared on these grounds, whenever it should be questioned, to defend the acquisition of Oude as a most important step, which was rendered necessary by the circumstances of the country. As regarded the condition of the people of Oude since the annexation of that province he would read to the House a letter upon that subject from the Governor General of India, dated May 3, 1856, in which it was stated—

“Oude remains perfectly tranquil. Some of the zemindars holding armed forts, and among them the Thelsepore Rajah, have availed themselves of the option given them by General Outram, and have paid part of their arrears in guns, which are taken at a valuation, although nothing in the shape of coercion or threat has been used to make them do so. The ryots continue, as from the beginning, to show the best proof of satisfaction and confidence, by flocking back to tracts of country which were rapidly becoming desert and jungle, owing to the population being driven away, either by oppression practised on themselves, or by the feuds and ravages of the zemindars in the neighbourhood. I have no doubt this confidence will spread and increase with the progress of our three years' temporary settlement, teaching them, as it will, that their rent henceforward will be fixed and moderate, and that everything they possess beyond that rent will be their own without fear of extortion.”

Since he had last addressed the House upon the subject another lapse had taken place, as the dynasty of the Rajah of Tanjore had become extinct, and there had not appeared to be any necessity for founding a new one. He would next proceed to state to the House what had been the progress in domestic affairs in India since last year. One of the most important questions connected with domestic progress in India, and one which excited the greatest attention in this country, was that of railways, and he would shortly state what progress had been made in that respect. The East Indian Railway had at present 121 miles open, and was in expectation of opening to Rajmahal, a distance of 190 miles, by the end of the present year. The Great Indian Peninsular Railway was at present open as far as Caurpoolie, a distance of ninety miles from Bombay. The Madras line was ready to be opened to Arcot, a distance of seventy miles. The Baroda Railway Company had made great progress in staking out and commencing their line towards Ahmedabad. The Scindo Railway Company had been equally expeditious in the works on their line towards Kurrachee. The surveys for new lines now in progress, or about to be commenced, were that of a line to Nagpore, from the Great Indian

Peninsular Railway Company's line on the north-eastern extension; that of an extension of the present Scinde line to Lahore; and that of a new line from Calcutta eastwards to Dacca. The progress of these railways was of the very utmost importance, and ought in every way to be encouraged. For his own part, he had seen with the greatest pleasure a proposal which had been made a short time back for establishing a railway in India without a guarantee from the Government. The system of always requiring a guarantee for works in India was in many respects a most unfortunate one for that country, because it, to a great extent, tended to discourage private enterprise, besides the heavy charge upon revenue such as he had previously shown to the House. He was not prepared to sanction any scheme which might be proposed, simply because it had been proposed by private enterprise, but every scheme which afforded fair prospect of advantage ought to be, as far as possible, encouraged. The subject next in point of attraction to the railways was the telegraph, and its progress in India had been very curious. The subject of the electric telegraph had been reported on by Lord Dalhousie in his minute of February, 1856, from which it appeared that the electric telegraph had now been in operation in India above a year, and the results were most satisfactory. The construction of the lines commenced in November, 1853, and up to February last 4,000 miles had been completed. The total cost of the work had been upwards of £200,000 sterling, or at the average rate of about £50 a mile. The receipts during the past year have been upwards of £20,000, and they had gone on increasing every month. The estimated cost of working the line was about £30,000 a year. The actual cash receipts, therefore, even in the first year amounted to more than two-thirds of the working expenses, while the charges for messages were lower than on any other line in the world. Dr. O'Shaughnessy, through whose exertions and superintendence this great work has been carried out, stated that he had been perfectly successful in establishing the direct transmission of signals and messages between Agra and Bombay and between Agra and Peshawur—

"So that an answer is obtainable within two minutes from one end of this line to the other through 1,600 miles of line, in which eight rivers are crossed by submerged cables of upwards of 40,000 feet in length."

Mr. Vernon Smith

The Government of Oude was transferred to the East India Company on the 7th of February last. On the same day operations were commenced for putting down the telegraph wire, and within eighteen days a telegraph of fifty-two miles in length, including a cable of 6,000 feet across the Ganges, had been substantially constructed and successfully worked. Dr. O'Shaughnessy had been one of those who had taken a most active part in the establishment of the telegraph in India, and several schemes proposed by that gentleman had not yet been carried into effect. One of those proposals was to connect India with England, and that scheme, if carried out, would enable him to obtain an answer from Calcutta in six minutes and a-half; so that, hereafter, if an hon. Member asked him a question when the House met, he might hope to afford him an answer before it rose. The condition of the postal service in India had been much improved since last year, and he had every reason to believe that eventually communication with India would be more rapid and would be cheaper than with many of the other colonies of this country. There was one other point to which he wished to refer—he alluded to the report of the Law Commissioners. The Law Commissioners had, in the third and last year of their existence, furnished the House and the country with a very able and valuable Report. He had been informed that he had given great, but he must say unintentional, offence to some members of the Commission by sending that Report to India. Now, the House would bear in mind that a great deal must be done by the Legislative Council, and the jealousy of that body was well known. If, therefore, he had acted without their assistance, they would not have been favourably disposed towards his plan; but his object had been as much as possible to work through that body, as being the only way fully to carry out the views of the Commissioners. Some of the proposals of the Commissioners were, from their very nature, incapable of any other but an Indian consummation. In the adoption of this course, he had been justified by the opinion of the Governor-General, who said, that to have acted upon the Report of this Commission without transmitting it to India, would have given the greatest offence in that country. The Indian Government and the Legislative Council would have thought themselves most contumeliously treated. One priprincipal point was, the amalgamation of the Sudder and Supreme Courts. This amalgamation, if compulsory, might have given great offence, because, while the Supreme Courts were accustomed to accuse the Sudder Courts of a want of law, the latter retorted by accusing the Supreme Courts of knowing nothing of India; and it was most desirable that, if possible, this measure should be carried out with the assent of both classes of courts. While speaking on the subject of amendment of the law, he might mention what had been frequently inquired in this House, that a patent law had been adopted in India, and was waiting for the consideration and sanction of the Court of Directors and of himself (Mr. Vernon Smith). One of the matters on which the Government of India most required amendment was the police, which was, in his opinion, by no means in a satisfactory state. He had already, in speaking of the Santal insurrection, referred to the defects of the police, and he believed that its faults were common to the whole of India. In Bombay there had been established a new system, by which the police would be placed under the immediate direction of the Government; and it was desirable that some experience should be obtained of the working of this system before any alteration was made in the police systems of the other presidencies. The whole subject was, however, under consideration of the noble Lord who had recently gone out to India as Governor General. Another question incident to this one of police was that of the torture, the existence of which had been brought to light by the meritorious exertions of his hon. Friend and colleague the Secretary of the Board of Control (Mr. Danby Seymour). He could assure the House that everything which was possible was being done for the eradication of this horrible system. It was unworthy of any one connected with the Indian Government to extenuate it, or to say that it was not torture, but only bodily pain. All these excuses were utterly puerile and contemptible. Neither would he consent to the fabrication that we had derived it from the native princes. Our business was to improve and to teach the natives how to live. For him, it was quite enough that revenue had been extorted by the infliction of bodily pain. Lord Harris, the eminent Governor of Madras, was perfectly sensible of the horrors of this system, and had taken the greatest pains to suppress it. His (Lord Harris's) opinion was, that it to a great extent resulted from the high rate of assessments; and that a re-adjustment of assessments would get rid of it. That, however, must be a slow operation, but in the meantime Lord Harris had set a careful watch upon this system, and was prepared to punish with the severest penalties—for there had undoubtedly been a want of severity in the penalties hitherto inflicted, and with dismissal from the service of any person who was convicted of the infliction of torture. The Indian Government, among other instructions, sent out an order that an Act should be passed for the enforcement of severe penalties for this offence. The law advisers thought that such an Act would be useless, and that the only way to suppress this evil was to separate the revenue from the police system. He (Mr. Vernon Smith) thought that this would be an excellent measure to adopt; but it was one which would involve considerable expense and would require much consideration, because we should have to decide whether we would establish an European police or would trust wholly or in part to native officers. He, therefore, could not help thinking that Lord Harris had not decided rightly in omitting to pass the Act to which he had referred. It was true that by regulations, adopted so late as the years 1816 and 1819, very heavy penalties were imposed for acts of torture, but it was clear that these regulations had never been enforced; and he thought that the passing of a new Act would have more effect than the renewal of old ones. He could not help thinking that when Lord Harris himself considered the matter, he would see that if no new Act were passed the opinion would prevail that, as hitherto no notice had been taken of this system, so no attention was intended to be paid to it in future. It was to him (Mr. Vernon Smith) most marvellous that successive Governor Generals, including among them a man of the greatest vigour and assiduity, Lord Ellenborough, should have gone out to India and returned without the slightest knowledge of the existence of this system of torture. He could not attribute it to any defect on their part, but must suppose that it arose from some fault of the system that such a thing should pass without being observed by them. He had been blamed for the strength of the observations which he made upon this subject last year; but he must say that he considered Government responsible for what had occurred under their rule. If they said they knew nothing about it, that was as good as saying that they did not perform the functions of governors. The next question to which he should call the attention of the House was, that of the introduction of an improved system of education. A new system had been recommended by his right hon. Friend the late President of the Board of Control (Sir C. Wood) in a despatch dated the 19th of July, 1854; and measures had been taken to carry those recommendations into effect by the appointment of directors, inspectors, and visitors of schools, the passing of rules for universities, the distribution of grants, and by other means. In the north-western provinces a new class of schools termed halkabunda (or circuit) had lately been established under the auspices of Mr. Reid, the Director of Public Instruction in those provinces; these schools were spreading rapidly over the country. The main cost of them was defrayed by the landed proprietors and cultivators by an assessment, voluntarily contributed by themselves, of 1 per cent on the Government revenue. Mr. Reid believed that, if this subscription could be generally obtained, a school might be established in every fifty and a half square miles of the country with no expense to Government but that of supervision. In the Bombay Presidency public libraries for the use of the natives have now been established in eight different districts, besides eight native libraries in the town of Bombay, which contained English as well as vernacular works, and were supported chiefly by local subscriptions. At Sholapore the subscriptions for a library and an English and Mahratta school amounted to 2,700 rupees, besides books. At Sattara they were 1,200 rupees. Among the Government grants was one of 4,000 rupees, given to the native students' "Literary and Scientific Society" towards a building for a lecture-room, laboratory, museum, and library, for which private subscriptions had been raised amounting to 10,000 rupees. The members of the institution hold a meeting once a month for the transaction of business, and reading essays in English; once a fortnight two meetings were held for a similar purpose in the vernacular. At these vernacular meetings large and interested audiences assembled, to witness experiments and illustrations of natural science, and to discuss questions bearing on the moral and social improvement of the people. Seven girls' schools, at present containing 450 children, are supported by the society, and two infant schools were under their superintendence. They already issued two monthly vernacular publications, and had undertaken to publish a series of papers in Mahrattée and Guzerattee, similar to Chambers's Information for the People. All this is the more remarkable as coming from a native society, themselves having experienced the benefits of education, and desirous of diffusing its advantages among their countrymen. This was the progress which had been made by education in India. It had not been so rapid as he could have wished, but attention had been called to this by the Home Government, and he hoped that the defect would soon be remedied by the more active exertions of the local authorities. In referring to this subject, he must not omit to notice the consequences which had resulted from examinations for the civil service in this country. He last year stated the result of the first petition for employment in that service. It was, no doubt, a matter of some regret that the number of candidates who had presented themselves for examination this year was not so large as it had been the year before, but it was not to be apprehended that this cause of complaint would continue. In looking back to the examinations of last year he rather lamented the extreme severity of the tests applied. He was bound in sincerity to admit that the questions put to the candidates alarmed him, not only for his own ignorance, but he had been assured that many Cambridge wranglers had been very much surprised by them. Except in the case of the professor of Italian, whom he reappointed, he had thought it advisable to select new examiners, and he had been so fortunate as in this year to obtain the services of one very competent gentleman from Trinity College, Dublin. The result of the examinations might be thus stated:—The total number of candidates examined is 56, whereas last year it was 112 (just double the number). The relative number of the candidates from the principal Universities in 1856 and in 1855 are as follow:—From Oxford, in 1856, 10; in 1855, 19; from Cambridge, in 1856, 14; in 1855, 32; from London, in 1856, 3; in 1855, 4; from King's College, London, in 1856, 6; in 1855, 3; from other English schools, &c., in 1856, 4; in 1855, 12; total, English, in 1856, 37; in 1855, 70. From Edinburgh, in 1856, 1; in 1855, 3; from Aberdeen, in 1856, 2; in 1855, 5; from other Scotch colleges and schools, in 1855, 7; total, Scotch, in 1856, 3; in 1855, 15. From Dublin, in 1856, 8; in 1855, 14; from Cork, in 1856, 3; in 1855, 5; from Belfast, in 1856, 2; from Carlisle, in 1856, 1; from other Irish colleges, in 1855, 2; total, Irish, in 1856, 14; in 1855, 21. From abroad, in 1855, 3; from at home (private tuition), in 1856, 2; in 1855, 3—i. e., English colleges, &c., in 1856, 37; in 1855, 70; Scotch, in 1856, 3; in 1855, 15; Irish, in 1856, 14; in 1855, 21; abroad, in 1855, 3; private tuition, in 1856, 2; in 1855, 3; total, in 1856, 56; in 1855, 112. One or two particulars with respect to the examinations might not be uninteresting. The plan heretofore pursued contemplated two examinations—the first, a general one; the second to take place after the lapse of one or two years, an examination in law and the Oriental languages. That system was established under the sanction of Lord Ashburton, Mr. Macaulay, and Mr. Lefevre. It was excellent in theory, but when it was brought to the test of practical experience, the second examination was seen to be surrounded with such difficulties that Mr. Macaulay had himself recommended that it should be relinquished. Strange as it might appear, it was not less true that it was found almost impossible to procure the means for a sound legal education in this country. The only substitute was a certificate attesting that the candidate had attended a certain number of lectures, but this was a very unsatisfactory expedient, for such certificates did not vouch for the candidate's proficiency, and were regarded merely as matters of routine. The difficulty as regarded the Oriental languages was almost as great; and another obstacle arose on the question of certificates of moral conduct, it being impossible to ascertain what became of the candidates during the interval between the first and the second examination. Taking into consideration all the circumstances of the case, he determined that the better course would be to give up the second examination altogether, and to send them out after they had undergone one examination only. He had provided a professor of Arabic and Sanscrit, but it was a little discouraging to find that not more than one candidate presented himself for examination in these studies. It was one of the principles on which Mr. Macaulay's minute was founded that in conducting these examinations care should be taken, not to examine a candidate in anything which, in the event of his being rejected, might be considered as lost time; and very possibly it was the knowledge of that fact which induced candidates to believe that it would not be necessary for them to "get themselves up" in Arabic and Sanscrit. With regard to the mode of examining, he had himself introduced what he deemed to be a very important alteration, a viva voce examination. The reason why he had done so was that he had always been of opinion that such a method of examination afforded a better test than any other of a man's moral qualities—his courage, his readiness, his aptitude, his self-possession. He confessed that he was not without his doubts as to whether the plan of competition would furnish any better guarantee for such qualities than the old system afforded; but, at all events, there was some approach to a test in a viva voce examination, and therefore he had adopted it. He had attended one of those examinations, and was struck with the readiness and proficiency exhibited by the candidates. Nor was his experience singular. He was happy to say that it was corroborated by the testimony of Mr. Dasey, a gentleman of great abilities and attainments, whose services he had been so fortunate as to secure for the examination of candidates. Mr. Dasey had at first a strong prejudice against the practice of viva voce examination, but he now admitted that it had worked well, and that its result was most satisfactory. In justification of this statement, he would read the following extract from a letter he had received from Mr. Dasey:—

"I beg leave to inform you that, in my opinion, the result of the viva voce examination in English History has been highly satisfactory. It gives me the greater pleasure to be able to make this statement, because I was one of those who at first thought the amount of viva voce examination for the Indian Civil Service disproportionate to the paper-work. Out of fifty-four candidates who answered to their numbers at the viva voce examination, I find that seven are classified in my notes as 'very good,' and have obtained fifty marks—the greatest amount which I am enabled to give. Of the rest the great majority are classified 'good' and fair,' averaging about thirty marks. Ten or twelve are 'indifferent,' with about fifteen marks each, and only three are marked 'bad,' and may be considered to have failed. I think this result is worthy of mention, especially as the examination often led the candidates into minute historical details in which no mere memoria technica, or cramming, could have given them any assistance."

And the best, by the way, was an Irishman. He confessed that he was much gratified by the perusal of Mr. Dasent's letter, for he regarded it as a most satisfactory statement, coming from one who was well qualified to pronounce an opinion on the subject. With respect to the general merits of the competitive system it must be admitted that the question assumed a different aspect in India and in England. For his own part, he thought that it was a mistake to suppose that, as a general rule, the civil service in this country opened a suitable field of exertion to men of high ambition and proportionate ability. In India, on the contrary, it did open such a field. There able and ambitious men were needed. The civil service was a fitting sphere for them, and in it they were sure to rise to eminence. He would not be understood, however, as concurring in the opinion which a distinguished Member of that House had not hesitated to express—that patronage was “an odious and a hurtful thing.” He repudiated that sentiment altogether, and rather favoured the doctrine of the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire—that patronage, well exercised, was one of the noblest attributes of power. What more delightful task could there be than to befriend merit, and to prevent talent from pining in obscurity? It so happened that during the period he had held his present office not a little patronage had passed through his hands. He mentioned the fact for the sake of alluding to a subject brought under his notice last year by the hon. and learned Member for Enniskillen (Mr. Whiteside), who, upon a similar discussion to this, had called attention to the circumstance that Irishmen were totally excluded from the Indian Bench. Finding this statement to be to a certain extent correct, he deemed it his duty to rectify so anomalous a state of things, and of three judgeships in his gift he had presented two to as many members of the Irish Bar, and one to an Irish Gentleman. He had appointed two gentlemen to the Court of Directors as nominees for the Crown; and, though sensible of the distinguished merits and services of Sir G. Pollock, he had not re-appointed him, simply because it was, he believed, the intention of the Legislature that the office should be held only for a stated period, and that it should not be perpetuated in the same hands. He had nominated General Vivian for one of the vacancies in the direction, and Sir Henry Rawlinson to another. He could not quit

this part of the subject without expressing the great satisfaction it had afforded him to engage for his own department the services of so distinguished an Indian administrator as Sir George Clerk. He mentioned these facts to show that the distribution of patronage, which had given rise to so much reviling of late, need not deserve all the reproaches cast upon it. Nothing had been more gratifying to him in all his public life than to be able to select for important public situations men with scarcely one of whom he had been personally acquainted, but whose high qualifications promised to be of the greatest service to India. He felt that he had already trespassed too long for the attention of the House, upon subjects for which, however, his remarks had been far too short to do justice to their unquestionable magnitude. He had passed hurriedly over topics which, if they had related to matters nearer home, might well have occupied weeks in their discussion. As it was, however, he had only to thank the House for the indulgence extended to him. The question of the right government of India was, perhaps, one of the most difficult problems that asked the solution of statesmen. The time had been when the rulers of that vast empire looked to nothing but the amount of revenue which they could extract from its people. Since then, however, thank God, a better day had dawned upon its many races and creeds, whose governors were now endeavouring to accomplish something for their social improvement. To interfere with their religion was to tread upon delicate ground—indeed, too tender to be touched by any man of moderate caution, not to say of even ordinary wisdom. The proper mode of improving their religion was by improving their morality; and this could be achieved only by setting them an example of inflexible honesty and good faith. This was the true policy which the Indian Government had to pursue; and in that policy he trusted they would be successful. He was too well aware that the wheel of political fortune might waft to the heights of Indian authority a man of no more than ordinary understanding and a resolute sincerity of purpose, but he would yield to none in earnest interest for the happiness of the inhabitants of India, early imbibed from those whose talents he could not hope to imitate, but whose zeal he aspired to equal, and now enhanced by the awful responsibility of the trust in his hands. It had been observed even by practical philosophers that it would be a proud day for England when she resigned to the inhabitants of India, well-educated, civilised, and regenerated, the sway which she now held over them. Such a result he could not anticipate that he should ever live to see. If, however, it occurred in his time, he, for one, should tremble for the consequences. What, then, was his own belief? Why, that it would indeed be a proud day for England when, maintaining her rule over this distant and populous empire, she could yet say that to the utmost of her power she had advanced the physical prosperity of a people which the ancient dynasties of their despots never cared for, and had given them intellectual gratifications which their native rulers never knew. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by moving a formal Resolution, embodying the result of the accounts given in his speech.

SIR ERSKINE PERRY said, that the closing remarks of the right hon. Gentleman must have gone home to the hearts of all who took an interest in the welfare and progress of India. It was deeply to be regretted that so few persons belonging to that category were present in that House. Questions relating to India were, unfortunately, not very popular; and independent members who broached them in that House were almost invariably greeted with a growl from the representatives of the Indian Government. He was glad, however, to see that during the last year that apathy had somewhat given way, in consequence of discussions in both Houses of Parliament, and some valuable steps had been gained. The public mind had at length become impressed with the conviction that the East India Company was no more than any other body of stockholders, having no connection, moral or physical, with India. It was also seen that the Court of Directors was a paid department of the State—a body of trustees for the Crown for the time being, their remuneration consisting partly of salary and partly of patronage. It had likewise been made clear that the finances of England were responsible for any deficiency in the revenues of India; and the Torture Report had shown that the people of that country were very poor, and unable to bear the burdens imposed upon them. It followed from these facts that the Indian Government ought to be as scrupulously economical in its expenditure as those who administered the funds raised from the English public. The East India Company, however, appeared to be blind to those principles, and were in the habit of treating the revenues of India as if they were still their own corporate funds. Nay more, they claimed to do this without the sanction of the Board of Control. The litigation in which they occasionally took part did them but little credit. In the Dyce Sombre case they recklessly spent enormous sums of money. When the Rajah of Coorg, after his deposition, sued them for his share in one of the public funds of the country, the Company urged a plea which, if put forward by any responsible department in this country, would have aroused general indignation and risked the safety of any Ministry. They asserted a right to appropriate this property of the Rajah as booty of war. That litigation was also commenced by them without the sanction of the Board of Control. Again, when they engaged counsel to resist the claim of the Nawab of Surat before a Parliamentary Committee, instead of giving the ordinary fee of £50 or £100, they gave a retainer of no less than 1,000 or 1,200 guineas. Such a wasteful expenditure of public money would not be allowed in the affairs of England. He likewise very much doubted whether the East India Company were legally entitled to expend the revenues of India either for such purposes as he had just mentioned, or in the payment of pensions to ex-Governors General. By an old statute, which limited the power of the East India Company while they remained a corporate body, with regard to the expenditure of their funds, it was provided that they should not bestow pensions exceeding £600 a year upon any of their servants without the sanction of the President of the Board of Control. A subsequent statute of 1813 enabled them to grant gratuities; but it appeared to him that in 1833, when all the corporate funds of the Company were taken from them, their power to expend money for those purposes totally ceased. He would like to hear the opinion of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General and the Solicitor General upon this point, and he thought it was the duty of the President of the Board of Control to examine carefully the Act of 1833, with a view of ascertaining what were the actual powers of the Board of Directors with regard to the expenditure of the revenues of India. In his opinion, the power exercised by the Company in making those grants was unconstitutional, and the pensions which they conferred, chargeable upon the revenues of India, far exceeded in amount those which were bestowed upon servants of the Crown in this country under the authority of an Act of Parliament. It might be said that a pension granted to a deserving Governor General was within the scope of the powers of Government, but in that case the House of Commons ought to be consulted, and if the Court of Directors acted without its sanction, they assumed powers which they did not possess. The Governor General was entitled to 240,000 rupees, or about, with the exchange, £27,000 a year; but if he were in the receipt of any other pension, annuity, or salary, Parliament had directed that that should be deducted from the amount of rupees, so that the salary of the office should be the sole recompense. Now, if Parliament had declared that amount to be the salary of the Governor General, how could a power be permitted to a branch of the Government and the Court of Directors to grant a pension of £5,000 without first consulting Parliament? It was said the President of the Board of Control had power to revise the acts of the Court of Directors; but it was almost impossible for one man to resist the grant of a pension to one who in a few days might become his colleague. Up to the time of Lord Hardinge the power of granting pensions had fallen into desuetude, though he was prepared to admit that £1,500 a year was granted to Sir George Barlow out of the corporate funds. In 1846 a pension of £5,000 a year was granted to Lord Hardinge, under the authority of the 33 Geo. III.; but though it came within the words of the Act, in his belief it did not come within the spirit. The recent grant of £5,000 a year to Lord Dalhousie did not even come within the words of the Act, as he was not at the time in the service of the Company. He, therefore, complained that the President of the Board of Control did not exercise sufficient supervision over the Court of Directors in spending their revenues. With respect to the financial statement of the President of the Board of Control it was not calculated to allay those fears as to the condition of the Indian finances which had been excited by the accounts formerly laid before the House. Lord Dalhousie had issued a Minute, comprising 180 paragraphs, which described the condition of India as most flourishing, and, if implicit credit was to be given to the statements contained in that document, no doubt could be entertained of the prosperity of our Indian Empire. They had, however, heard a very different statement that night from the President of the Board of Control, having been told that there would still be a very large deficiency in the revenue for the year. Lord Dalhousie, referring to the deficiency of the last three years, attributed it to the enormous expenditure which he said the Government were now making on account of public works, and he stated that in 1853-54 a sum of not less than £2,325,000, had been expended on those public works. There was a marked discrepancy, however, between that statement and the one published in the accounts laid before Parliament under the sanction of the President of the Board of Control, for the expense of public works, exclusive of repairs and military buildings, was put down at £1,659,771, and military buildings at £293,000, making a total of £1,952,771, while the account presented by the Court of Directors showed for public works a sum of £618,703, and for military buildings £282,376—in all 901,079. Now, he wished to ascertain the cause of that great discrepancy. When he, some time ago, referred to the deficiency in the Indian revenue, he had considerably underrated the amount, for he did not then take into account the deficiency in cash balances which amounted to £5,592,000. In point of fact, the deficiency in the last years for which accounts had been furnished—namely, 1853-54, amounted to the large sum of £8,136,040. Lord Dalhousie, in his Minute, gave the public to understand, that by the territorial acquisitions secured during his tenure of office, £4,000,000 had been added to the revenue of India; but the noble Lord only made out that amount of revenue by not giving one item of charge against it. He did not charge against the revenue one farthing for the expenses of the civil and military government of those territories. He credited the Punjab with £1,500,000 of revenue, whereas it had been shown that there was an annual deficiency of £59,000. For Sattara, he put down a revenue of £150,000, while there was an actual deficiency of £22,000. Nagpore he stated at £410,000, whereas it had been proved that no larger a revenue had been derived than £100,895. On the subject of opium, of Her Majesty's army, and receive pensions. The foreign legions that had been sent to the Crimea had distinguished themselves as much and had maintained as good order as any troops of her Majesty's service; and no doubt, had the war continued, would have conducted themselves as valiantly as any troops that had been brought into the field. The troops of the foreign legion consisted of 8,552 Germans, 3,013 Swiss, and 3,535 Italians—making together 15,100 men, and the cost of maintaining them was about £1,100 a day. The Swiss and Italian legions, he hoped, would, in the course of a very few weeks, be disembodied. With respect to the German legion, it appeared that a large portion of them were desirous of being transferred to the Cape of Good Hope. Her Majesty's Government thought that such a course was highly desirable, as those Germans were of the same character as the original settlers in that colony. Arrangements would, he hoped, shortly be made to carry out the object of their wishes by making the proposed transfer.

THE BISHOPRIC OF GLOUCESTER AND BRISTOL.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH begged to call the attention of the noble Earl the President of the Council to the vacancy which had recently taken place in the united dioceses of Gloucester and Bristol. He personally deplored the late lamented event that had occurred. During the last twenty-five years he had had the good fortune to be intimately acquainted with the late Dr. Monk, and he considered his death to be a great loss to the Church. He was a man distinguished for learning, for great kindness of disposition, and for magnificent liberality. He had at heart an object which he (the Earl of Ellenborough) rejoiced to say he, in a great degree, succeeded in accomplishing—namely, the extension of religious instruction in his diocese. When Dr. Monk was appointed Bishop of Gloucester he held that bishopric alone, and he then resided in the middle of the county and in the county town. At that time the right rev. prelate was in the habit of holding constant communication, not only with the clergy, but with the laity of his diocese, and he was thereby in every way enabled to keep a constant and vigilant watch over the spiritual wants of his diocese. He believed that the right rev. Prelate had never at any time any desire to have the bishopric of Bristol annexed to that of Gloucester. A large palace had been built at Gloucester, which was, he believed, very expensive to keep up, and that circumstance, combined with others, induced the Bishop to reside permanently at Stapleton, near Bristol, and abandon altogether his original residence. The consequence was that, in point of fact, during the last ten or fifteen years, there had virtually been a non-resident Bishop. He would not say that the ecclesiastical duties of the diocese had been neglected; he believed that they had not been; at the same time it was impossible not to feel the absence of that total want of personal communication with the gentlemen of the county which a Bishop was enabled to keep up when resident in a county town; and which increased to a great extent his usefulness. A petition to Her Majesty was at the present moment in circulation throughout the county, and, from what he had heard several months ago as to the feelings of the Members for the county and of the county gentlemen, he believed that petition would express almost universally the sense of the county in favour of the separation of the two dioceses. Under these circumstances, he would express not only the hope, but the confident expectation, that the Government would adopt no measure whatever for the purpose of filling up the existing vacancy in the diocese of Gloucester and Bristol until they had had the opportunity of ascertaining the feelings of the inhabitants of Gloucestershire on the subject he had alluded to.

LORD REDESDALE thought it impossible for any clergyman to carry on the duties of the extended see of Gloucester and Bristol in the manner in which they ought to be performed. The union of Gloucester and Bristol was effected at a time when it was determined that the number of bishops should not be increased, and it was with that object that four sees were united—namely, Bangor and St. Asaph, and Gloucester and Bristol—in order that the two new sees of Manchester and Ripon might be created. In the case of Bangor and St. Asaph the opposition to the union of those sees had proved successful; but the two dioceses in question were not so large as Gloucester and Bristol, and he thought, therefore, that the inhabitants of the latter dioceses had a decided claim upon Parliament for the separation of the two sees.

EARL GRANVILLE said, the question was one of a very difficult character, and one which could not be decided without grave consideration. In several other sees great complaints had been made of the extended area comprised within them, and of the heavy duties, therefore, devolving upon the occupants of those sees. The separation of Gloucester and Bristol was not, therefore, a question to be decided upon by itself; the other cases to which he had referred must be taken into consideration at the same time. All he could say was, that after what had passed there that evening, he had no doubt the successor to the late Bishop, whoever he might be, would be appointed subject to any future arrangements which might be come to with regard to the separation of the diocese.

OUR RELATIONS WITH THE UNITED STATES — REPORTED DISMISSAL OF MR. CRAMPTON—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: I wish to put a question to the Government on a subject which at the present moment is a source of great anxiety to the people of this country. It is reported that a packet has, within the last few hours, arrived from the United States, bringing intelligence of importance with regard to our relations with that country. I should feel obliged if the noble Earl would inform us whether any such packet has arrived, and if it has, and it be convenient to the Government, if he would give us information as to the intelligence brought.

EARL GRANVILLE said, I understand that the Asia has arrived, and that by that packet some news of a private character has been brought, which is not quite clear—not quite intelligible. There is a report, on the one hand, that letters have been received to the 27th announcing the departure of Mr. Crampton; and, on the other, that a telegraphic message was sent on the 28th stating that there was no further news. But it is not quite clear as to what the telegraphic message alludes—whether it means that there is no further news except the dismissal of Mr. Crampton, or that Mr. Crampton's dismissal had not taken place. Her Majesty's Government have received no official information on this subject. Letters, however, will arrive either to-night or to-morrow morning from Mr. Crampton to the 27th; but until then Her Majesty's Government will not be able to give any authentic information on the subject.

MERCANTILE LAW AMENDMENT BILL.

House in Committee (on Re-commitment) (according to Order).

On Clause 1, which repealed the 17th section of 29 Charles II., c. 3, "for the prevention of frauds and perjuries," and the 7th section of the 9 Geo. IV., c. 14,

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, the noble Lord behind him (Lord Overstone) had presented a petition from traders of the city of London, who complained that this clause would tend to prejudice very much their commercial interests. Their Lordships were aware that this Bill had been introduced in pursuance of the report of a Royal Commission which had been instituted in consequence of complaints from Manchester, Glasgow, and various places in the north of England against the present state of the mercantile law. That Report recommended the assimilation of the laws of the two countries, and, as far as regarded personal property, the repeal of the 17th section of the Statute of Frauds. That section provided that no contract for the sale of goods for a value exceeding £10 should be valid unless it was reduced to writing, or unless part of the purchase money had been paid, or part of the goods purchased had been delivered. Now, in the case of land, it was perhaps desirable to require that all contracts should be reduced to writing; but he did not think that it was so in the case of personal property. At present the necessity of reducing contracts to writing was nullified by the provision that the contract should be valid if part of the purchase money had been paid or part of the goods delivered; and, in point of fact, it was impossible to reduce every mercantile contract to writing. It was true that it was said by some of the most respectable merchants, that they entered into contracts through the agency of middlemen or brokers, and, if it were not necessary to reduce these contracts to writing, contracts might be palmed off on them which they had never authorised. Now, he could only say that he believed that if the present Bill became law, the custom would continue the same as it was at present. The fact that in the north of England nine-tenths of the contracts made were not in writing, and that in Scotland there was no law compelling them to be so, afforded a strong presumption that that portion of the Statute of Frauds was really of no practical value; and he trusted therefore, that their Lordships would not offer any opposition to the present Bill, for by agreeing to it their Lordships would, in reality, be discouraging, not encouraging fraud.

LORD OVERSTONE said, he should not divide the House upon the Bill; but on the part of the merchants of London, he begged to say that the result of the inquiry which had taken place before the Select Committee had only been to strengthen the opinion of the great majority of the mercantile interest in the soundness of the views which they had all along entertained in opposition to this clause. Merchants were persons whose business necessarily led them to enter into contracts of a very extensive and complicated character. For the purpose of coming to that common agreement on which such contracts must be founded, it was obviously requisite that much preliminary conversation must take place; and the danger which the merchants apprehended was, that those inchoate and incomplete conversations would be forced upon them as binding contracts, there being no written memorandum whatever on which to found such obligations. They believed, if such were the effect of the clause, that they would be precluded from that freedom of discussion which was necessary to every satisfactory commercial contract. In order to prove that portion of the case which he thought was in dispute, he had called before the Select Committee the highest mercantile authorities in the city of London, in respect both to character, to the amount of their business, and the eminence of their abilities; but had he been required to establish the whole case, he should have called before that Committee witnesses from every branch of trade in the city of London, all testifying to the like apprehensions arising out of the peculiar nature of the transactions in their respective branches of business. It would be presumptuous in him to attempt to discuss with the learned authorities in that House the legal bearings of the question; but he was bound to say that the merchants and traders of every kind and description to whom he had referred, who were men of great intelligence and ability, were very capable of tracing out the legal bearings of provisions of this nature, and that they were fortified in all their apprehensions by the authority and advice of the professional persons in the city by whom they were usually guided. Moreover, while they were prepared to bow with great respect and deference to high legal authorities undertaking to declare what the law was and to administer it, they felt considerable apprehension when the same legal authorities came down to determine what the law ought to be, when they found that the reasons and arguments by which those legal authorities were guided, indicated the absence of a sufficient knowledge of the details of the various transactions of business and of the complicated circumstances which belonged to the course of contracts in each respective branch of trade; and at the same time they ventured to think that they were as competent judges as to what forms were applicable to matters of trade and commerce, and as to what dangers and difficulties would arise to commence from the application of particular forms of law, as the highest legal authorities that existed. He had thought it necessary to say thus much by way of caution. In that House it was impossible to contend against the combined legal opinions which undoubtedly existed in favour of the proposed clause; he had discharged his duty in representing the feelings of the mercantile body in regard to this Bill; and he rejoiced, therefore, that it must go down to another assembly, where the mercantile interests were more adequately represented than in that House, and where the objections to the measure would be more ably put forward, and, he believed, with greater effect than they could be in their Lordships' House.

LORD CAMPBELL said, he had a strong conviction that the Bill would be as much approved of in the House of Commons as by their Lordships, and that by the bulk of the mercantile community the present law was condemned. It did more harm than good; it covered frauds, and did not prevent them. It was an error to imagine that it required contracts for the sale of goods to be always in writing, for it dispensed with it when there was either part payment or part delivery; and necessarily dispensed with it in those cases, for surely if the purchaser had paid his money he must have his goods, or if the seller had delivered the goods he ought to have the price. But these three exceptions ate up the rule, and gave rise to enormous litigation of the very nature it was intended to prevent. Last term the Court in which he presided had been occupied two days on this question. A horse was bought by word of mouth; and the seller then begged to retain him for a few days, and was allowed so to do. The buyer then refused to receive the horse. The Court held this borrowing of him by the seller equivalent to a delivery, and sufficient to satisfy the statute. The books swarmed with cases of that kind.

LORD ST. LEONARDS remarked, that this showed that the statute had received a large amount of judicial illustrations.

LORD CAMPBELL: At an enormous expense to suitors.

LORD ST. LEONARDS: Then the public have paid a large price for the judicial exposition of this statute, and should not be deprived of it just when its construction was settled.

LORD CAMPBELL: It is more unsettled than ever.

LORD ST. LEONARDS: No wonder if the Court of Queen's Bench take two days to deal with a trumpery case about a horse, such as we have had described. But decisions on such points had nothing to do with the substance and object of the statute, which applied to land as well as goods, and all the objections urged against the sections applying to goods equally applied to the sections relating to land. And some day it would be said, "Why retain the enactment as to land when it has been swept away with regard to goods?" And were their Lordships prepared to say that verbal bargains should dispose of estates? The argument that delivery or payment was proveable by verbal evidence had no weight, for delivery and payment were facts easily proved, and were different from the terms of a contract, which few persons could recollect accurately. He thought the noble Lord (Lord Overstone) did wisely not to divide the House; but he doubted, with him, the policy of an alteration made against the opinion of the great merchants and traders of the city of London.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY admitted that the higher class of merchants in the city of London were opposed to the alteration of the existing law; but against that he had to state, that no inconvenience had been experienced from the law of Scotland, which was different from that of England; that the practice of the whole north of England was in conformity with the law of Scotland; and that more than a half of all the pecuniary transactions of England connected with buying and selling were conducted in defiance of the law, and without the slightest security that the parties would be able to enforce their contracts. Having stated those facts, he thought he had established a case which called for legislation, and laid a ground for asking their Lordships to supply the mercantile classes with a security which they did not at present possess. If they altered the law as now proposed, no person would be precluded from still requiring a written contract, while the great bulk of the mercantile community would be relieved from a difficulty of which they had long complained.

Amendments made: The Report thereof to be received To-morrow.

REFORMATORY AND INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS BILL.

LORD RAVENSWORTH, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said it would not be necessary for him, on the present occasion, as he had no reason to anticipate any opposition to the measure, to refer in detail to the advantages which might be expected to arise from the establishment of reformatory and industrial schools, by which the endeavour was made to check the source of crime by sending juvenile offenders to these institutions, and removing them from the contamination of bad parents. Such institutions would undoubtedly form one great means of drying up the sources of crime. That crime had recently increased was unhappily proved by statistics, and if that increase had taken place under disadvantageous circumstances—if there had been any redundancy of population or scarcity of employment, or if wages had been reduced—we could not have been surprised at the fact, however we might have deplored it. But at no time had there been such general prosperity in the agricultural, manufacturing, and mining districts, as had existed during the last few years, and yet, in the face of that prosperity, and of all the pains that had been taken to improve the condition of the labouring and mining population, there had unquestionably been an increase of crime in this country. The main objects of the present Bill were to simplify the existing modes of committing young persons to reformatory schools, to give to parents the power of removing their children from one school to another, and to give facilities for the proper identification of children. The Bill, which amended the provisions of the 17 & 18 Vict., c. 86, and the Scotch Act brought in by Mr. Dunlop, had received the sanction and concurrence of the Government, and three or four of the clauses had been brought in by the Home Secretary in the other House. He anticipated no opposition to the measure, but, should any be offered, he hoped to be able to produce satisfactory reasons why their Lordships should look upon it with favour. He moved that the Bill be read a second time.

After a few words from the Earl of HARROWBY, in approval of the measure, Bill read 2^a and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Thursday next.

House adjourned till To-morrow.

REFORMATORY ESTABLISHMENTS— QUESTION.

VISCOUNT NEWPORT said, that as the course to be taken by more counties than one depended upon what were the intentions of the Government with respect to Reformatory Establishments, he begged to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether it was the intention of Her Majesty's Government to make any increased allowance for the maintenance of juvenile criminals committed to such establishments?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, the question had been brought under his consideration some time ago, and he undertook to arrange with the Treasury what would be considered a fair and reasonable allowance for it to make towards the maintenance of reformatory institutions. In settling the question, however, a difficulty arose in consequence of the different rates of expense gone to by different establishments, and which stood in the way of their arriving at an immediate conclusion. Still, the principle which he thought ought to be acted on was, that the Treasury should appropriate, for the maintenance of the inmates of those institutions the same amount as would have to be expended had they been sent to prison and maintained there at the public expense.

INCUMBERED ESTATES COURT (IRELAND)—QUESTION.

COLONEL GREVILLE said, he would beg to ask the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland if it was his intention to bring in a Bill in the course of the Session to continue the Encumbered Estates Commission?

MR. J. D. FITZGERALD said, he must beg to remind the House that at the very earliest date in the present Session he introduced a Bill, having the double object of enlarging and making permanent the system at present in operation in Ireland for the sale of estates, as well as the introduction of other large reforms into the Court of Chancery. The Bill, however, had been referred to a Select Committee, and from that cause, in conjunction with the advanced period of the Session, it would not be practical to carry the Bill through during the present Session. He was aware of the great anxiety which prevailed on the subject, and he likewise believed that it was the unanimous opinion that the system of the Incumbered Estates Court should be continued. He was, therefore, prepared to advise Her Majesty's Government to introduce a Bill to maintain the jurisdiction of the court without intermission for another year.

THE RETURN OF THE TROOPS— EXPLANATION.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he wished to correct a mistake which he had fallen into on Friday night. He stated on the part of his hon. and gallant Friend (Sir M. Berkeley) that a message had been received to the effect that the Princess Royal had arrived at Malta with a battalion of the Guards on Board. He feared that in that statement he had misled the House, for since then another telegraphic despatch had been received, explaining the actual state of the case as follows. The St. Jean d'Acre had arrived at Constantinople, and left for Malta on the 5th, with a battalion of the Guards on board. The Agamemnon had arrived on the 6th, and left the same evening with a battalion of the Coldstreams, while a battalion of Rifles had arrived there on its way home. The Princess Royal was at Constantinople taking out her lower deck guns, in order to go on to the Crimea for troops.

CIVIL SERVICE COMMITTEE—
QUESTION.

MR. KENDALL said, he would beg to ask the Chairman of the Civil Service Superannuation Committee (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) whether he could inform the House when the Report of the Committee would be laid upon the table, and what had been the cause of the delay?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the Civil Service Committee had completed the evidence on the principal branch of the inquiry, and had decided before proceeding with any more evidence or coming to a conclusion, to refer the evidence to actuaries, to give an opinion as to a question of calculation by which they thought their judgment would be guided. The report of the actuaries had not yet been received, and therefore the Committee were not at present in a condition to pursue their inquiry.

OUR RELATIONS WITH THE UNITED STATES—QUESTION.

MAJOR REED: Sir, seeing the hon. Gentleman the Member for Inverness-shire (Mr. Baillie) in his place, I beg to ask him if, after the opinion expressed by the hon. Baronet the Member for Hertfordshire (Sir B. Lytton), confirmed by that of the noble Lord at the head of the Government, as to the inexpediency of entering upon such a question at present, it is his intention to raise the discussion of which he has given notice on the Motion for going into Committee of Supply on the Army Estimates?

MR. BAILLIE: I beg to state that it is my intention to call the attention of the House to the question of which I have given notice, as soon as possible after the receipt in this country of the official accounts relative to what has passed in the United States. If those accounts should reach England previous to the bringing on of the Army Estimates, I shall do so then; if not, upon the earliest subsequent occasion.

MR. DISRAELI: I may take this opportunity of inquiring from the noble Lord the First Minister, whether he has now received direct information of the retirement of Her Majesty's Representative from Washington?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, Her Majesty's Government have received no information upon which any reliance can be placed.

THE TIPPERARY BANK—
QUESTION.

MR. BOWYER said, he would beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether Her Majesty's Government had had their attention called to certain observations of the Master of the Rolls last Tuesday on the case of the Tipperary Bank? The Master of the Rolls was reported to have said:

"He could not help expressing his great surprise that the Government had allowed this case to go on so long without interfering. Having regard to the English shareholders, he had no hesitation in saying that if the Government remained longer quiescent—if they did not at once hand the matter over to the first law officer of the Crown—they would be guilty of a gross dereliction of duty. It would be proved to the satisfaction, he felt convinced, of the entire English and Irish public, before he delivered his judgment, that the most nefarious frauds had been committed, and if the Government neglected their duty by passing the matter over they could not complain if the public were to say they had been conniving at what had been doing."

He wished to ask whether the Government intended to take any steps in accordance with, or in consequence of, the opinion of the Master of the Rolls?

MR. J. D. FITZGERALD said, he must beg to apprise the hon. and learned Gentleman that on Friday last he saw in a Dublin newspaper, which had been indirectly transmitted to him, observations similar, as he believed, to what the hon. and learned Gentleman had just read. Immediately upon reading the judgment, acting upon his own responsibility, he communicated with the Crown Solicitor to ascertain when the learned Judge was to deliver judgment, conceiving that he would not have made observations so strong if there had not been good grounds for his doing so. As yet he knew nothing of the case beyond those rumours which met the public eye from time to time in the newspapers. But the course of the learned Judge was quite clear, namely, to order the documents in the case to be handed over to the Crown Solicitor, to be laid before him (the Attorney General) for his direction. He had, therefore, as he said, put himself in communication with the Crown Solicitor, and had directed him, if the evidence assumed the character hinted at by the learned Judge, to inform him, in order that he should be enabled to act promptly and decidedly, and put the law in force against whoever were the guilty parties.

OATH OF ABJURATION BILL.

Order for Third Reading read; Bill read 3^d.

SIR FREDERIC THESIGER: I rise, Sir, to move to leave out all the words from the beginning of line 8 in page 2, and to insert the words of which I have given notice. It is with extreme reluctance I trespass once more upon the attention of the House with reference to this often discussed and all but exhausted subject. If I could bring myself to believe that it was a question of trifling importance—if I could ever feel any indifference to the subject, or permit myself to act upon the suggestions of my own ease and comfort, I should undoubtedly abstain from occupying further time with its consideration. But the more I consider the question; the more I feel the great importance of it, and I am therefore anxious to make one more effort to arrest a step which, according to my view, will be of the most serious detriment to the public interests of this country. I cannot hope to command the attention of the House, for I have nothing of novelty to say to it. All I ask is for its patience and forbearance, of which I have, on former occasions, received a very large share. Sir, it is unnecessary for me to explain to the House the character and nature of the Amendment which I propose; it is sufficiently intelligible. Its object, which must be apparent to every one, is to bring back the oath of abjuration substantially to the form in which it has existed without objection for 150 years, omitting from it those portions which have been objected to upon the ground of having ceased to be of any effect; and I think there are considerations which ought to induce the House to accept the Amendment which I now beg to propose. In considering the question, it may be useful to take a retrospective glance of the circumstances which have brought the question into its present position. From the earliest period of the existence of the Legislature down to the year 1830 it never entered into the imagination of any one that a person not professing the Christian religion could be a Member of the Legislature. In the year 1830, Mr. Grant first brought forward the Motion to relieve the Jews from the disabilities under which they laboured. And I should recommend to Gentlemen who are in the habit of asserting that it is merely by the accidental insertion of certain words in the oath that the Jews are excluded from the Legislature, to read the account of the various disabilities which are described by Mr. Grant to have existed no longer ago than twenty-six years from the present moment; and it will be found that those disabilities extended to their exclusion from almost every civil office and employment. Mr. Grant was not successful in his first attempt, but he renewed it with more success at a later period—namely, in the year 1836. From that year, however, down to the year 1847, there was a cessation in the agitation relative to the question, although in the intervening time various Bills had been passed relieving the Jews from disabilities and admitting them to certain privileges, amongst others to corporate offices. But in the year 1847 the noble Lord (Lord J. Russell) was returned for the City of London with Baron de Rothschild; and in pursuance of a pledge which the noble Lord gave on the hustings, from that time down to the present almost every year has been marked by some attempt, directly or indirectly, to introduce the Jews into the Legislature. The oath of abjuration was that which furnished what might be called the stumbling-block to the admission of the Jews; and, therefore, in the course of all their discussions it invariably was made the object of attack and animadversion. Undoubtedly there were objections to that oath, arising from a portion of it having become completely obsolete, there being no person in existence to whom it could apply. Unfortunately neither party felt disposed to do that which, I think, ought to have been done—namely, to omit those objections which were patent to all in the oath. Those who were in favour of the exclusion of the Jews from Parliament felt that there was some danger in touching the question at all, for fear of placing that portion of the oath on which they relied in jeopardy. Those, again, who were desirous of admitting the Jews into the House were unwilling to abolish the oath, because by so doing they felt that they would lose a standing argument as to that oath presenting the only impediment for the admission of the Jews. Under these circumstances, neither party was desirous of advancing. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Manchester (Mr. M. Gibson) taking advantage of this state of things, to use a familiar expression, made himself master of the position. He, thereupon, determined to cut the knot asunder of the difficulties, by proposing a measure to abolish the oath of abjuration altogether. That oath, however, even by those who are in favour of the admission of the Jews to Parliament, is admitted to contain much matter of the highest importance. It is admitted that it contains the recognition of the Protestant religion, as laid down by the Act of Settlement. There were many hon. Members who were startled at the notion of getting rid of the whole of the oath, and of thereby abandoning the important recognition to which I have referred. But, unfortunately, they consented to the second reading of this Bill, under the expectation that they would be enabled to alter it in Committee according to their wish. The noble Lord the Member for London by this movement of the right hon. Gentleman, found himself placed in a subordinate position with regard to this question. The noble Lord was compelled to work under the right hon. Gentleman, he having got possession of the ground, by which the Jew was to be completely relieved from the disability under which he laboured. The noble Lord objected as strongly as any one to getting rid of those words in the oath which recognised the Protestant succession. The noble Lord introduced in Committee a portion of the oath of abjuration, omitting, however, the most important parts of it, as I am prepared to show, and inserting but a small modicum of the oath of abjuration. The question then is, whether we are content to abandon most important portions of the oath which have been taken by all Protestants and Christians without exception for 150 years, and be satisfied with the tame, meagre, lifeless phraseology which the noble Lord the Member for the City of London proposes to substitute.

Now, what is the nature of this oath of abjuration which we are called upon to abandon? A very great mistake appears to exist upon this subject. It has been supposed that the oath of abjuration is only an expansion of the oath of allegiance. Now, this is an entire misapprehension. The oath of allegiance is an oath which may be taken to the Sovereign by persons of all religious denominations; but the oath of abjuration stands upon much higher grounds. The oath of abjuration says:—

“I do truly and sincerely acknowledge, profess, testify, and declare on my conscience before God and the world, that our Sovereign Lady

Sir Frederic Thesiger

Queen Victoria is the lawful and rightful Queen of this realm.”

Is there nothing significant in this oath? Is there nothing in this portion of it which ought to be retained? The title of Her Majesty to the Throne of these realms depended upon the Protestant character of her ancestors and the Act of Settlement. If it depended simply upon a mere abstract hereditary right, we know that a certain Roman Catholic Sovereign would be at this moment, de jure, king of these realms. Now, this is not a mere idle phantom or claim which is assumed, like our claim to the sovereignty of France, and which was continued up to a recent period. It is a vital principle. It is a claim which I shall show you is admitted and acknowledged, and is only not enforced because the time has not as yet arrived when it would be convenient to enforce it. This subject has been introduced to the House before by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Napier), and it becomes peculiarly necessary to press it on the notice of the House in order to enforce the remarks I have made in respect to the existence of a de jure claim to the throne of England. In the year 1841, some years after the accession of our Gracious Sovereign, Archbishop Cullen, now the Pope's legate in Ireland, published a selection from the Papal bulls for the use of the College De Propaganda Fide, and he gave in a preface, which he addressed to Cardinal Frasoni, now I believe at the head of the College, the reasons why he published this selection from the bulls. He stated that it was—

“That all things may be in readiness which may appertain to the right and expeditious management of affairs.”

And he added at the end of the letter—

“That the edition contains all those Apostolic letters which have been promulgated since the first edition down to our own times, and the necessity or opportunity for consulting which may occur in the management of the affairs of the Sacred Council.”

Amongst those bulls which were selected for the use of the College, are two bulls which were published by Clement XIII. in 1759 and 1760. It is very significant that these two bulls are selected amongst eight in all, out of sixty-six other bulls. These bulls so extracted from the rest, and published for immediate use, were bulls as I have stated of Pope Clement

XIII., and addressed to King James, as he calls him, "To our most dear son in Christ Jesus, the illustrious King of Great Britain." In them the Pope informed King James, as he called him, that he had nominated to certain bishoprics in Ireland, and gave his reasons for not mentioning "the King's" name in the letter of appointment. He said—

"That for reasons which his own prudence would suggest he had not mentioned His Majesty's name in the letter of appointment, but that he addressed the letters to him as a pledge that this omission of his name in these letters should not injure or derogate from his right of nomination, but that his right should remain uninjured."

Now, let me ask, why these particular bulls are selected in this extraordinary manner, published, as is stated, for immediate use of the Propaganda, and brought out from the Papal armoury and burnished up by Archbishop Cullen, if this is not intended to be a claim to be brought forward on a fitting occasion? But this is not all. In a book published in Ireland, De Hiberniâ Dominicâ, the following most remarkable passage is to be found—the more suspicious from its having been erased from several copies:—

"The heirs of Sophia of Hanover were placed on the British Throne as being the nearest of kin to the family of the Stuarts, who were Protestants. But," added the writer, "there are fifty and more Catholic princes of either sex who enjoy the right of nearer blood to the Stuarts which that most accurate genealogical tree of celebrated lineage which I hold in my hands distinctly exhibits."

I will venture to ask whether you do not believe that Bishop Cullen possesses that genealogical tree, and that the selection of these bulls is not some of the fruit of that genealogical tree? This being the case, we are now to consider whether we, as Protestants and Christians, can believe that those words proposed to be omitted from the oath are insignificant or unimportant?

"I do truly and sincerely acknowledge, protest, testify, and declare, on my conscience, before God and the world, that our Sovereign Lady Queen Victoria is the lawful and rightful Queen of this realm."

Are you disposed to accept this lifeless phraseology proposed to be substituted for the strong and heartfelt assertions of the right and title of Her Majesty to the Throne of England. I believe that the noble Lord would have been as desirous as any one of retaining these words, if he could have done so consistently with the object which he has in view. We have heard from the noble Lord, on former occasions in this House, a noble declaration as to the sovereignty of Queen Victoria. But the noble Lord is in this situation—he is desirous of getting rid of the words, "On the true faith of a Christian," which constitutes the only impediment to the introduction of the Jew into Parliament; and if the noble Lord introduced all the other words of the oath which I propose, then the noble Lord would have no excuse whatever for not adding those words at the close of it; but, on examining the meagre and unsatisfactory modicum of the oath proposed by the noble Lord, the House will see that it is impossible to adapt those words to it. In like manner there are many hon. Members who, being anxious that the oath should be changed for the purpose of admitting the Jews to Parliament, are willing, for the purpose of accomplishing that end, to abandon all the remainder of the oath, which, nevertheless, they do not deem unimportant.

The hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck), on a former occasion, taunted me with not bringing in a Bill absolutely to exclude the Jews from Parliament; and the noble Lord at the head of the Government said that I might bring that question before the House on the Motion for the third reading. Now, in answer to the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield, I have only to say that there is no necessity for the introduction of such a measure, inasmuch as the members of the Jewish persuasion are virtually excluded by the oath of abjuration as it stands. In respect to the observation of the noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston), I would remind him that it would be impossible for me to place distinctly before the House, for its consideration whether or not the Jew should be permitted to sit in Parliament, because that question would be entangled and embarrassed with those questions arising out of the important words of the oath proposed to be omitted. And that shows the wisdom of the course proposed by my right hon. Friend the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli), who, as we all know, is as anxious as any one in this House for the admission of the Jews to Parliament. But my right hon. Friend not only suggested, but proposed, that the two questions should be separated from each other, and he proposed an Amendment, which would have brought the question of the admission of the Jews distinctly before the House, while, at the same time, he would have preserved in its substantial integrity this oath, which had always been taken, without any exception, for 150 years. It is, I maintain, quite impossible to mix up the question of the oaths to be taken by the Christian Members of this House, and that of the admission of the Jews to seats in Parliament. No Member of this House ought to try, by a mere change in the form of an oath to admit the Jews to seats in the Legislature, because the consequences would be, that the Jew would not merely be admitted to a seat in this House, but also to many other offices in the State, which it would be highly objectionable for a Jew to hold. On this particular point I will appeal to the noble Lord the Member for the City of London. In 1847, and also in 1853, the noble Lord sought to guard against danger from the introduction of Jews into that House by certain clauses which would have the effect of excepting certain offices from being held by Jews. These were offices connected with the United Church of England and Ireland—with the Ecclesiastical Courts—with the Universities, our colleges, and our schools. But, even as a Member of the Legislature, hon. Members have not looked sufficiently forward to provide for the duties which would devolve upon the Jew if he were ever admitted into this House. Suppose a Jew were appointed to sit on an Election Committee, which sat de die en diem, with the exception of Good Friday and Christmas Day, both of which days, of course, the Jews regard very lightly; but these Committees frequently sit on Saturdays, a day which the Jew venerates as his sabbath. Now, could the attendance of the Jew be exempted under such circumstances? I merely throw these things out as illustrations of the position in which matters would stand by merely acting upon the supposition that the difficulties of the question could be removed by simply adopting the changes proposed in the oath of abjuration, and without regarding all the circumstances which must be taken into consideration before the Jew, if admitted, could take his proper place in the Legislature. It is absolutely essential that there should be a distinction between the oath of a Jew and that of a Christian. When no objection is made so far as the Christians are concerned, why, I ask you, do you propose to remove all the important and significant parts of the oath which relate to Christians only, and from the obligation of taking which they do not desire to be relieved? Now, I feel that I have a right to expect that the support and the vote of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. Gladstone) will be given in favour of my views, because that right hon. Gentleman, in the course of one of the numerous debates on this subject, made the following statement—

“He frankly owned that he was glad the noble Lord retained these words in respect to all Christian Members of the House, considering the solemn duties which we are called upon to perform. He thought the noble Lord had acted wisely in declining to reduce that high standard which we had fixed for ourselves.”

What I ask the House to do is to retain the oaths with the objectionable parts weeded out, and to let the question of the admission of the Jews to Parliament be brought on as a distinct question.

Such is the position in which this question stands; but I am not unprepared to go further with it, if it should become necessary to do so. I am prepared, Sir, to insist on the retention of the words “on the true faith of a Christian,” and to contend that there ought to be no thoroughfare into this House for any one but a Christian man. I am desirous of considering fairly the various arguments which have been brought forward in favour of the admission of the Jews into Parliament; but before I do so I would wish to clear the way by removing a misapprehension which appears to prevail in consequence of the expression which was used by the noble Lord (Lord J. Russell) in the course of the debates on this subject, when he called upon the House to complete the edifice of religious liberty by admitting the Jew to sit in Parliament. A general impression seems to prevail that Parliament for a great number of years was gradually widening its doors for the admission of persons of all religious denominations, and that the Jew is the only person now excluded. Many hon. Members will, however, be surprised to hear that there has been no instance in which Parliament has interfered directly to seat amongst them any person of any religious persuasion, with the exception of the case of the Roman Catholic Relief Act, by which our fellow Christians, the Roman Catholics, are admitted to seats in this House. But their admission had been decided rather upon political than theo-gical grounds. It is not, therefore, correct to say that Parliament has been gradually enlarging its doors for the purpose of admitting persons of every religious denomination. The Dissenter has never been excluded. Even during the existence of the Test and Corporation Acts there were members of that body in this House. The Unitarian has never objected to take the oath with the words "On the true faith of a Christian;" and in respect to the Quaker certain Bills were passed in the reign of George II., and without reference to the admission of that body into Parliament, by which they were permitted to make affirmation in all cases in which the oath was required from other religious denominations. When the question arose in the case of Mr. Pease, those Acts of Parliament were considered by the Committee to whom that case was referred, and they reported that the language of those Acts was so comprehensive as to admit the Quaker to a seat in this House. This is the first measure brought into this House since that of 1829 in reference to the admission of Roman Catholics, by which an attempt is made deliberately and distinctly to introduce a person into Parliament who was not of the Protestant religion. There is an argument used which I confess it is irksome to me to advert to, and that is one which has been often made on these occasions, and which has been as often refuted, namely, that it is merely by an accident, by the insertion of certain words at the end of the oath, and which had been introduced with quite a different object, that the Jew had been excluded from a seat in this House. I really was astonished that the acute and original mind of my hon. Friend the Member for West Surrey (Mr. Drummond), should have revived this exploded fallacy. If it were not presumptuous to suppose a single combat between the noble Lord the Member for London and myself on this ground, I should say that we have mutually conceded to each other this point, and have brought it to a position in which no argument can arise from the circumstances under which this oath was framed, and that therefore the introduction of such an argument as that to which I have referred is no longer tenable. I have admitted again and again to the noble Lord, that at the time these important words were introduced into the oath, there was no intention by such language to exclude from Parliament members of the Jewish persuasion; inasmuch as at that time there were comparatively speaking no Jews at all in England; and the noble Lord has admitted on his part that no one at that time ever contemplated the possibility of the Jew being entitled to sit in the British Legislature. But unfortunately this argument was urged upon the very last occasion when this Bill was under consideration. With a view of closing this controversy I will trespass upon the patience of the House by reading the judgment of Mr. Baron Parke in the case of Miller v. Salomons, in reference to this point—

"But it is a fallacy to argue that, because the immediate object of the Legislature was to give a more binding effect to a Christian oath, not to exclude the Jews and others than Christians, therefore they meant all such to be admitted, and consequently that the terms of the oath ought to be modified so as to carry that object into effect, and to permit all not of the Christian faith to take the oath in a form binding on their consciences. Nothing was further from the contemplation of the Legislature. The truth is, they never supposed that any but Christians would form a part of either House of Parliament. The possibility that persons of the Jewish persuasion should be peers, or be elected Members of Parliament, probably entered their contemplation as little as that of Mahomedans or Pagans being placed in either category. Both of these are, in effect, on precisely the same footing in this respect as the Jews, and the argument applies equally to them all. In enacting a provision aimed at a peculiar class only of Christians, the Legislature have, in the most positive terms, required an oath from every Member of the Legislature which none but a Christian can take; and this enactment must have the effect of closing both Houses of Parliament against every one but a Christian."

Now, an hon. Gentleman, in the course of the last discussion on this subject, adverted to the circumstance that between the first and the thirteenth William III. there was no oath containing the words, "on the true faith of a Christian," and he argued that during that period a Jew might have taken his seat in this House. I must, however, remind the hon. Gentleman that the Jews at that time were regarded by this country as aliens, and were charged with an alien duty.

I will now proceed to another class of arguments used by the advocates of this Bill. The first generally brought forward is this—that all the subjects of a free State are entitled to an equality of civil rights. Now, Sir, I am prepared to concede that point in the fullest possible manner. But, then, we must understand what is really meant by the term "civil rights," because if "civil rights" are intended to include political power and office, then I utterly deny the proposition that the subjects of a free State are equally entitled to the enjoyment of civil rights. Every subject of a free State is no doubt entitled to the full enjoyment of property, to the liberty of his person when he does not offend against the law, to civil and religious freedom within the limits of the constitution. He is equal in the sight of the law with all his fellow-subjects. But political power and office are not the natural right of all persons in a free State. They belong to those only to whom the State thinks proper to assign them. If this principle be not correct, all the qualifications for, or disqualifications to, office in this country are utterly unjustifiable. I think it will hardly be denied that it is competent to a Christian community to impose, as a restraint upon the exercise of a certain office, the profession of a certain religion, and that it is also competent to relax the obligation as to certain offices and to retain it as to others. And, therefore, I hardly think that anybody will venture to maintain that the claim of the Jew to a seat in the Legislature can be placed upon the abstract right of all persons in a free State being entitled to equal civil rights. But, then, it is said, "Oh, you have given judgment against yourselves, even admitting you are right in your decision. You have given political power and office to the Jew, and, therefore, you cannot, in justice, withhold from him a right to the higher office in the shape of a seat in the Legislature." Now it is no doubt true that by various Acts of Parliament we have empowered the Jew to fill the offices of Mayor, Sheriff, and Magistrate; but it is argued, and I think with success, that there is a most important distinction between admitting a person to a subordinate office, and making him, in some degree, supreme, by enabling him to sit in the Houses of Legislature, and assist in making our laws. In the subordinate office the magistrate has merely to administer the law that is made by a Christian Parliament. If such a person be guilty of any violation of duty, he is amenable to punishment. But a Member of the Legislature, in that character, is superior to the law. He has nothing to guide him but his moral conscience and responsibility, and how any one can assume, because by admitting the Jews to inferior offices, we are bound to admit them also to seats in this House, I am at a loss to conceive. And, Sir, I cannot help thinking that there may be circumstances which, even in the cases of those subordinate offices to which reference has been made, make the holding of these offices incompatible with the profession of the faith of a Jew. I am sorry to be compelled to advert to this particular subject; I would willingly pass it by; but I feel that I cannot. Sir, I find in the newspapers that on the Thanksgiving Day the Lord Mayor and the Corporation of London went in state to the Cathedral of St. Paul. That was the Lord's-Day, which was selected for the purpose of our "entering into His gates with thanksgiving and into His courts with praise,"—thanksgiving and praise offered up in the only name by which our praise can be acceptable to God. There, seated on high, in the midst of that congregation, and in all the pomp of official dignity, sat one to whom those prayers must have been a profanation and a farce. How is it possible not to sympathise with the devout worshipers in that temple on that day? What must their feelings have been? How distressed must they have been; and how disturbed their devotions at such a sight? Sir, the Lord Mayor's presence there was essential to his office or it was not. If it were not necessary, then it was only a gratuitous profanation of his faith. If it were, then that is a striking instance in which the faith of a Jew is incompatible with the holding of even one of those subordinate offices. And give me leave to say—to remind the House that if we do not ourselves guard against the introduction of the Jew into such offices, we may, over and over again, if the Jew be elevated to the judicial bench, see a repetition of this profanation. That, I earnestly hope, the House will take into its serious consideration.

But, Sir, to pass from that to the consideration of those other arguments which I have heard used in debates on this question. One of them is of rather an extraordinary nature. It is said, "Well, but you have virtually admitted the Jew to the Legislature—at least you have admitted him to a share in the legislation of this country by giving him the elective franchise." Now, I know very well what would be said of me—how such an argument as that would have been characterised if I had used it. To argue that the por-session of an infinitesimal share in the election of a representative to sit in this assembly and assist in making laws for the country can have the slightest analogy to the giving to the Jew a place in the legislature, and allowing him to take a part in making the laws for this nation, seems to me the most remarkable argument—a most extraordinary—the most subtle argument I ever heard. Theoretically—metaphysically, perhaps, there may be something like a shadow of reason in it; but practically, and to all intents and purposes, it amounts to an utter absurdity. “But then,” it is said, “putting aside the question of the Jew being allowed to share in the election of a representative in Parliament, some electors of large constituencies like that of London have chosen to elect a Jew to represent them in Parliament; and their choice ought to be regarded and their wishes fulfilled.” Now, this is an argument which has been used by the Archbishop of Dublin, (Archbishop Whately) who has most consistently and most honourably maintained the right of the Jew to sit in Parliament; and who has ultimately narrowed the question to this ground—that the choice of the electors is decisive. I ventured on a former occasion to quote the argument of the most rev. Prelate, and was rather roundly taken to task by my right. hon. Friend the Member for South Wiltshire (Mr. S. Herbert), who said that I had grossly, though no doubt unintentionally, misunderstood the argument of Archbishop Whately. Now, Sir, I have read as much as most men of the works of that admirable author; and certainly if there be one thing more than another characteristic of his style, it is the transparent clearness of his language. So that, however I may differ with him, it is quite impossible for me to mistake his language. Since then I have found a partial confirmation of what I said in the preface of a work recently published by the Archbishop—The Remains of Bishop Coplestone. In that preface, Archbishop Whately, in referring to different topics on which he agreed or disagreed with the Bishop, says—

“I never could consent to join issue on the question, the only one usually discussed, whether a Jew, or any one else not professing Christianity, should sit in the House of Commons, because I regard that as a question which should be left in each particular case to the decision of the electors.”

Now, if the most rev. author means to say that this matter should be left to the consideration of the electors by the Legislature introducing a law to that effect, undoubtedly he has not expressed himself with his usual felicity. But let that pass; and let us come to the argument. The electors of London say, “We are a powerful and numerous constituency; and we have over and over again deliberately elected a Jew as our representative. You ought to respect our feelings and our wishes, and to accept our choice; and it is highly improper that we should be interfered with by any law of yours which excludes a Jew from Parliament.” With great deference to the electors of the City of London, I beg leave to say, that they have put their case on a most erroneous basis. They may be a very powerful constituency; but they are only a minute fraction in the general constituency of the country. They are not to choose for themselves; but for Parliament and for the nation. They have no right to elect any one who is incompetent to sit in Parliament. If they do so, they act precisely as if they did not exercise their right of election at all. If a claim like that made by the City of London were admitted, similar privileges may be claimed by other constituencies, some of whom may think a miner would be a convenient representative, others a tidewaiter or an alien. In that way the law may be broken in upon according to the wishes of the different constituencies, if we listen to the argument upon which the City asks us to seat Baron de Rothschild.

Now, Sir, I believe I have, as shortly as I could, gone over the various arguments which are usually brought forward when this question is discussed in this House; and the House will observe that up to the present time I have not referred to that which is really the important and the vital question in this case. Notwithstanding the various arguments put forward in considering this matter, it is perfectly clear that the strength of our case rests upon sacred ground. I confess that if it were not for the religious element in this question—if we were not to consider the matter in its religious aspect—I should be perfectly indifferent as to whether the Jew sat in Parliament or not. Our opponents have endeavoured to draw us off the high ground on which we base our case, to bring us down to combat with them on a lower theme; but I confess that I can never consent to abandon the vantage ground upon which we must stand as Christians in this case, or not stand at all. Unless the religious part of this case operates to exclude the Jews, it is immaterial to me whether they be unnational in their habits and customs. It is a matter of perfect indifference to me whether they be strangers or sojourners in the nation where their lot is cast, looking forward for an inheritance in another land. All that is to me wholly unimportant. In a civil view of the question I would not oppose the introduction of Jews to the Legislature on such grounds as these. It is not on such grounds, therefore, but upon much higher considerations, that I own I base my opposition to this measure. Now, Sir, it is admitted, I believe, pretty generally that our institutions—the institutions of this country—have Christianity for their foundation, and it has been over and over again emphatically said, that Christianity is a part of the law of the land. In whatever sense those words may be understood every one, I think, will be disposed to admit that it would be rather an anomaly in a Christian country, and where the institutions of the country were Christian, if any person who was not a Christian were permitted to take a part in the making or the altering of those laws which are themselves founded on Christianity. But the noble Lord (Lord J. Russell) on a former occasion made use of an argument which I observe is repeated in a leading article this morning in a journal that takes care to give a direction to our debates and tell us the arguments that are to be used. The noble Lord said, “You talk of unchristianising the Legislature. Why, if by admitting the Jew into Parliament you would unchristianise the Legislature, you have, then, by admitting him amongst your people unchristianised the country.” With great deference to the noble Lord, I do believe that had such an argument been used against him, he, by his powers of sarcasm, would have instantly withered it into atoms. To suppose that there is the slightest similarity between the case of those people mingling with your people—or, I should rather say, amongst them, for though the Jews live amongst us they are not of us—not concerning themselves with the Christian religion, not interfering in the remotest degree with the religious observances of the country, but enjoying the benefit and the blessings of a Christian Government—I say, Sir, that to argue that there was the slightest resemblance between the case of a people so mixed up in any way with the people of this country, and that of the Jews placed here in the supreme station of Legislators to make laws respecting the religion of this country—to have the power to enact laws to govern a Christian community—does appear to me to be the most extraordinary argument that can possibly be adduced. Now, the noble Lord is obliged to be inconsistent with himself, when he argues as the advocate of the Jews. The noble Lord is deeply impressed with a sense of religion. I am satisfied that the noble Lord is a sincere believer in the Christian religion; but the noble Lord is unfortunately in a false position when, with religious feelings strong in his mind, he is compelled to come forward here as the advocate of the case of the Jew; for, says the noble Lord, in a speech to this House—

“And I shall state more; when speaking of the Legislature which has to dispose of and to control the various interests, ecclesiastical and secular, of the country, religion ought to influence and control the decisions of its members.”

May I venture to ask the noble Lord what religion? The answer is obvious. The Christian religion. That is the high standard to which all our laws ought to conform. That ought to be the guide, the controlling principle of all our legislation; but I can scarcely believe that the noble Lord is preserving that principle pure and simple, when he is endeavouring to infuse into it some little of the Mosaic.

Sir, I look with astonishment at the union of parties whom I see banded together for the one common object of carrying this measure. In the first place, I find the advocates of “civil and religious liberty.” Now, I believe that those Gentlemen are most sincerely attached to the religion they profess, but those who enlist themselves under the banner upon which those words are inscribed, are usually Dissenters and opposed to the Church Establishment. We have in addition to those, certain Gentlemen who are of opinion it would be desirable to emancipate the Church from the State, and to revive Convocations in all their power. There could be nothing more calculated to advance their object than for Parliament once to pronounce that religion had nothing to do in our deliberations, and that the Jew might be admitted to a seat in this House. But, Sir, if once that proposition is maintained by Parliament, I cannot understand how it will be possible afterwards to defend the Church Establishment in connection with the State. Therefore, those two parties, the advocates of civil and religious liberty and those who desire to emancipate the Church from the State, are bound up together in this alliance, and by different means are pursuing the same end. Associating with those two parties are the Roman Catholics, who, of course, are no friends to the Established Church, and who are, of course, ready to aid in the furtherance of any measure that would promote the object they have in view—namely, the defeat or destruction of that establishment. These, Sir, are the parties to this combination, united together each to advance the particular object it has in view, and all hoping to obtain what they desire by seating the Jew in the Legislature. Now, Sir, I tremble for the consequences of the false step of erasing from the oath “on the true faith of a Christian.” You cannot stop there; other demands will be made on you. The infidel—the man not influenced by any religious obligation at all, but who has what he calls a conscience, which is guided by what he calls his morality—he also will desire relief; he will ask to be relieved of the necessity of all oaths. If you take this step you must yield to him, because you cannot stop short on your downward progress; and ultimately, by its own act and its own admission, the Legislature will have been deprived of its Christian character. By the omission of these words, the Legislature will deprive itself of that great character; and at length it will be becoming avowedly irreligious, by requiring no test at all. Sir, I feel most deeply on this occasion. When I was admitted to this House, I solemnly took the oath at this table “on the true faith of a Christian.” I took upon myself that part of the duty of a Legislator which required me to assume the badge of a Christian. I took it, not for the purpose of a crusade against the religions professed by other persons; but, Sir, I assumed that badge as a pledge that I would defend the sacred interests of Christianity which were entrusted to my care. Sir, I know perfectly well that I shall be charged with being actuated by a persecuting and intolerant spirit. I am not insensible to that charge. I regret most deeply, if my motive should be misunderstood. I have no personal hostility to any one or to any religion; I have no desire to persecute any one. I do not, by my endeavour to preserve the Christian character of this assembly, in any way show a persecuting spirit, because it is not for the purpose of persecuting the Jew—it is not for the purpose of compelling him to adopt another religion, that I appear here. It is in self-defence. It is in defence of the ark of Christianity before which I stand, and which I shall defend against Jew or any other party by whom I think it is in danger of being assailed. I trust, Sir, that this House will do the same. I hope we shall hold fast to our duty as Christians without wavering in the discharge of the solemn duty that is imposed upon us. I trust we shall not set an example to the people of this country of indifference to Christianity; but that we shall, as their representative, preserve in this House that respect which they outside manifest it for themselves, and which constitutes the glory and happiness of this country.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, to leave out from the beginning of line 8 to the end of line 14, in order to insert the words—

“I, A.B., do truly and sincerely acknowledge, profess, testify, and declare in my conscience before God and the world that our Sovereign Lady Queen Victoria is lawful and rightful Queen of this Realm, and of all other Her Majesty’s dominions and countries thereunto belonging:

“And I do swear that I will bear faith and true allegiance to Her Majesty Queen Victoria, and Her will defend to the utmost of my power against all traitorous conspiracies and attempts whatsoever which shall be made against Her Person, Crown, or Dignity:

“And I will do my utmost endeavour to disclose and make known to Her Majesty and Her successors all treasons and traitorous conspiracies which I shall know to be against Her or any of them:

“And I do faithfully promise to the utmost of my power to maintain, support, and defend the Succession of the Crown against all persons whatsoever, which Succession, by an Act intituled ‘An Act for the further limitation of the Crown and better securing the rights and liberties of the subject,’ is and stands limited to the Princess Sophia, Electoress and Duchess Dowager of Hanover, and the Heirs of her body being Protestants:

“And all these things I do plainly and sincerely acknowledge and swear according to these express words by me spoken, and according to the plain and common sense and understanding of the same words, without any equivocation, mental evasion, or secret reservation whatsoever; and I do make this recognition, acknowledgment, and promise, heartily, willingly, and truly, upon the true faith of a Christian. So help me God,” instead thereof.

MR. BOWYER said, he must complain that the hon. and learned Gentleman who had moved the Amendment had, on a former occasion, thrown out imputations of disloyalty against a distinguished Prelate of the Roman Catholic Church, than whom there was no man in the British dominions less obnoxious to such charges. He had accused Archbishop Cullen of publishing a collection of bulls, one or two of which had been promulgated with the intention of asserting the right of the Pretender to the Crown of these realms; and from this act the hon. and learned Gentleman had endeavoured to deduce the inference that Archbishop Cullen, as loyal a man as himself, was disaffected! He (Mr. Bowyer) had been favoured with a letter from the most rev. Prelate, relative to this matter, and would read from it an extract which would place the question in its true light. The accusation, it should be premised, had been made on the authority of Mr. M'Gee:—

"The work to which Mr. M'Gee and Sir Frederic Thesiger refer, is a collection of bulls and other documents connected with the Propaganda, or found in the archives of the Sacred Congregation. It consists of six volumes—I think in 4to. There are some briefs appointing bishops, at the recommendation of the Pretender, which were inserted merely as historical documents not previously published. It would be absurd to suppose they were published as having reference to our times, when the Stuart family does not exist. There are several similar documents in the Bullarium Magnum. I think Mr. M'Gee can make very little capital out of such publications."

Besides, it was a collection which would not have been complete without these documents. That statement of the most rev. Prelate would, he was sure, be accepted by the House as a complete refutation of the charge of disloyalty which had been raised by the hon. and learned Gentleman. The charge itself was one of those ridiculous mare's nests which the hon. and learned Gentleman and the two hon. Members for North Warwickshire were in the habit of discovering, and which were frequently left unnoticed by the Roman Catholic Members, from a conviction that their Protestant colleagues generally would, of themselves, through their own good sense, perceive the absurdity of such statements.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: I am sorry, Sir, to have to trouble the House once more upon this matter, but, as the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Sir F. Thesiger) has made an elaborate vindication of his opinions upon this subject, I do not think it would be respectful to him or dignified in this House to proceed at once to a division without taking any notice of his arguments. Let me first observe, that upon this subject the advocates for the admission of the Jews into Parliament stand in a more advantageous position than they did before. The position is this —the hon. and learned Gentleman abandoning the old oath—giving up that which is usually taken by Members of this House—proposes a new oath and new securities, and also in the new oath proposes to insert specific words in order to exclude the Jews. Now, that, Sir, I consider is a great advantage for those who are arguing for their admission, because it is a concession that the oath as at present framed cannot be maintained. It is, I assert, perfectly absurd to renounce the Stuarts, of whom none exist, as claimants to the Throne. If we are to have a new oath, to be taken by Members of this House, I think that in that oath we should not go beyond that which is necessary, or at least presents an appearance of necessity, and we should not load the oath with superfluous words and superfluous engagements; but we should only ask, when men come to the table on a solemn occasion, to claim a right to sit in this House as Members of the Legislature, that they should enter into engagements which are proper for us to require and for them to undertake. Now, when I look at the oath proposed by the hon. and learned Gentleman, I find a great deal that is unnecessary. In the oath proposed by the hon. and learned Gentleman are these words—

"I, A. B., do truly and sincerely acknowledge, profess, testify, and declare in my conscience, before God and the world, that our Sovereign Lady Queen Victoria is lawful and rightful Queen of this realm, and of all other Her Majesty's dominions and countries thereunto belonging."

Now, Sir, I hold that to be quite unnecessary. A person who has just taken the oath of allegiance to Her Majesty is called upon to repeat an assurance that Queen Victoria is the rightful Sovereign of these realms. I can well understand there was a time when Parliament thought it advisable—whether wisely or not I will not say—that, as there were persons who, admitting William III. as the Sovereign de facto, still regarded James II. as the Sovereign de jure, Members who came to be sworn should testify and declare that William III. was the lawful and rightful King. But, Sir, there is no occasion for such words now that the subject of the controversy has long since disappeared. Therefore, I do not think that we should call on the Members of this House to swear that which there is no occasion to swear. The hon. and learned Gentleman then goes on to say in the oath he proposes—

"And I will do my utmost to disclose and make known to Her Majesty and successors all treasons and traitorous conspiracies which I shall know against Her or any of them."

I do not see what especial propriety there is in a Member of this House taking that oath, any more than any other of Her Majesty's subjects. It is the duty of all persons who take the oath of allegiance—of all loyal subjects—to make known all traitorous conspiracies which shall come to their knowledge. The lowest and poorest of Her Majesty's subjects is equally bound to that duty as the Members of this House. There is no reason why Members of this House should be more likely to come to a knowledge of traitorous conspiracies than any other subject of the Queen, therefore, I do not see that that passage in the oath is necessary. Privy Counsellors, and those filling the offices of Secretaries of State, may have means of learning the secrets of traitors, and it would be their duty immediately to take means to counteract the attempts of the traitors; but it is by no means the duty or the business of a Member of this House to make himself peculiarly acquainted with any danger likely to affect the safety of the Crown. But the hon. and learned Gentleman has laid, and properly laid, the greatest stress upon the maintenance in the oath of the words, "on the true faith of a Christian." He adverted—I hardly know for what purpose or to what intent—to the controversy as to whether those words were originally intended to exclude Jews from Parliament. I imagine, whatever the hon. and learned Gentleman may say, that there is no doubt they were not intended for any such purpose. Giving the hon. and learned Gentleman the benefit of the supposition that Jews would have been excluded—if the Jews in the time of James II. had attempted to obtain seats in this House—I think, on the other hand, it must be admitted that the words were not intended for that purpose, but were intended as a more solemn form by which certain Roman Catholics, who were believed not to be loyal to the Protestant Sovereign, would be bound without power of evasion. The words were meant to secure the fidelity of Christians, not to procure the exclusion of the Jews. That is a point of considerable importance, when you attempt to frame a new oath, of which the simple object is to exclude the Jews; but it appears to me the most simple plan is to do what was done under the Commonwealth, and as is now done in some of the States of the American Union—to compel the person seeking admission to the House to declare and testify that he professes the Christian faith. Under the British monarchy that has never been required; but it appears to me that, if it be intended to exclude Jews from Parliament, that is the plain and simple mode of doing it. No one will dispute with the hon. and learned Gentleman that there are certain qualifications which the Legislature has a right to impose, whether in regard to the holding of offices or sitting in Parliament. But, on the other hand, unless you have strong grounds of exclusion, it is the common right of every subject to enjoy such offices, to obtain such legislative power as the favour of the Crown or the election of his fellow-countrymen may bestow upon him. Any capricious exclusion may have the effect of excluding Englishmen from the just objects of English ambition, and that, as has been truly said, is one of the greatest hardships you can impose upon them. Therefore, you must not only say, "I choose to have qualifications and exclusions;" but you must show that such exclusions are founded on the strongest grounds of State policy, and even of State necessity. That necessity, as to the Jews, I maintain has utterly and completely failed of proof. I have often had before to say that I do not think mere ground of religious faith is a proper ground of exclusion; and I say, in the second place, with the greatest confidence, that, if it were a ground of exclusion, tests and oaths do not enable you to ascertain the religious opinions of any man. I know of nothing in the faith of the Jew, believing as he does in the Old Testament, which should prevent him from doing his duty as a Member of this Legislature, and, with respect to any political acts in which he may be called on to concur, performing that duty faithfully. The hon. and learned Gentleman has done me the honour to refer to an opinion which I gave—that I do think religious obligation is incumbent on this House in its legislation. He looks to that religious obligation in the form of an oath—in precise words. Well, Sir, I do look to it in the convictions and persuasions of this Christian community. I think that, unless the people of this country do feel that religious obligation, you never can create it by means of an oath. If it were necessary, there is no want of illustrations on this subject. At the present time re-religious obligation is generally felt, whether by members of the Established Church, by Protestant Dissenters, or by Roman Catholics having seats in this House; but if we look back to the time soon after this oath was imposed, what do we see? A man as distinguished for his talents as, perhaps, any Member of this House ever was—Lord Bolingbroke—sat here as leader of this House. I know not whether he had then adopted the opinions which he afterwards, in the most elaborate work, endeavoured to promote, but we know that, when he had adopted those opinions—when he had written that work, it was the ambition of his life to be a Member of the House of Peers, to be admitted to the table of the House of Peers, where he would have said—

“ I sincerely speak these words, without any equivocation, mental evasion, or secret reservation whatsoever, and I make this recognition of my promise, heartily, willingly, and truly, upon the true faith of a Christian.”

Now, Sir, Lord Bolingbroke had no difficulty in declaring those words. Mr. Gibbon, who sat in this House, likewise had no difficulty in declaring those words. My hon. and learned Friend, I was happy to hear, acknowledged, on a former occasion, that with respect to men who do not feel this obligation—who do not feel it to be an immoral act to make such a declaration without being persuaded of it—you can have no security whatever. What, then, is the value of the religious test which the hon. and learned Gentleman is desirous to impose, and what is the justice, what the policy, of saying to a Member of this House, who has been duly elected, and comes to the table and says he does not see anything in the oath to which he objects; but, in fairness and honesty, he must tell the House that the words “on the true faith of a Christian” are not binding on his conscience—what are the justice and policy of telling him, “You are really a man who feel religious obligations—you are clearly a man who will not deceive us—you are acting according to your own belief and faith, and you are totally unfit to sit in this House; but if we can find a man who will dissemble in that respect, and whom we know by his own writings to be totally opposed to every Christian sentiment and every Christian belief, that is the man we will trust?” The argument is one which has certainly been well beaten, because it has been discussed not only upon this question, but upon the Catholic question, when it was maintained, and at length triumphantly maintained, that religious faith ought not to be a ground of exclusion from this House. I am sorry the hon. and learned Gentleman feels it an imputation upon him, yet I cannot but say the exclusion savours as much of persecution—that is, it savours as much of the principle of punishing a man on account of his religious faith as any other persecution of a cruel description, which has been inflicted in past times. I am sorry to see that in the dominions of the King of Sardinia a man has been sent to prison for six months for reading, in the open marketplace, certain passages of the New Testament, because the effect was said to be to bring the Christian religion into contempt. That is an act of persecution, and your exclusion of the Jew rests on precisely the same principle. I do not enter into a defence of the Lord Mayor—whether he was right or wrong in going to St. Paul's on the Thanksgiving-day. No doubt he meant to say, “As Lord Mayor of this great city I am ready to render homage to God, and to join in the celebration of peace so happily restored to the nation.” I have always put this question on the general ground of religious principle. It is rather for the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli), who, on the peculiar ground of the merit of the Jews, always advocates their cause, and always votes in their favour—it is for him, rather than for me, to show the merits of the Jews. I do not claim their admission to this House as a sort of indulgence, I claim it as a matter of right and justice; and I do trust the smallness of their numbers will not prevent their having that justice granted them which was granted to the Roman Catholics when their claims on the ground of religious liberty were too powerful to be longer resisted. Sir, I entirely oppose the Amendment.

MR. WARREN: Sir, I should certainly have contented myself with recording my vote this evening, if I had not thought the question before us of such grave importance as to justify a brief statement of the grounds on which that vote will be given; but I feel heavily discouraged while venturing to follow the noble Lord the Member for London in the debate. Sir, the claims of the Jews to sit in our Legislature have, during the last quarter of a century, been repeatedly and earnestly urged, and as resolutely resisted, without reference to party considerations, by the most distinguished men of the age—by as enlightened statesmen and as devoted Christians as ever adorned either House of Parliament—and among the latter I would undoubtedly class the noble Lord the Member for the City of London, who has been so prominent an advocate of this measure, and than whom, I believe, no more sincere and earnest Christian sits in this House. The question, therefore, must be one of serious difficulty, and involve considerations of proportionate weight and magnitude. Having always felt a profound interest in that question, I have from time to time read, I believe, everything that has been said on it, in this and the other House, weighing every argument carefully and dispassionately, sincerely anxious to form a right judgment on the matter; for I avow that I cannot bear to see any class of my fellow subjects unjustly denied or deprived of a right, or a trust, (between which there is a fundamental distinction necessary to be borne in mind in these discussions) which they properly regard as one of transcendent importance and value. No true Englishman can look with indifference on persons so situated; and his sympathies will go forth towards them all the more eagerly, if he find the demand for justice preferred with persevering moderation and dignity. He will be disposed to look with a certain sternness upon the reasons relied on as justifying the exclusion of a British-born subject from the British Legislature; and will not yield to them, unless his reason and conscience recognize their overwhelming cogency. That, Sir, is the spirit in which I approach this question to-night. And as for the Jews, so far from entertaining prejudices against them, I regard them with feelings akin to awe, as I watch them—the most marvellous of the dwellers upon earth—intermingling inoffensively, but never identifying themselves, with other nations, and fulfilling, and yearning for the accomplishment of, their own grand and mysterious destiny. I cannot think or speak of them with levity—I would not willingly wrong them in act or word; for if I could, then, while they might be true Jews, I should be no true Christian.

But, Sir, in these few words, I conceive, is to be found the true point—the true pressure—of this great question. If he and I be true to our respective faiths, then I think there is a fatal incompatibility of principles, pretensions, and qualifications for being brother legislators—regard being had to the true nature and objects of legislation for a Christian state. Whatever he could prove to be, in the opinion of a liberal and enlightened people, a wrongful disability has been removed. He is now placed on a level with our best fellow-citizens in point of personal security and social position; he is clothed with rank—even hereditary rank—and dignity; he sits in the chair of magistracy, and at this very moment the highest chair of the magistracy of London is filled by a distinguished friend of mine of the Jewish faith, who discharges his duties in a way to command the respect and admiration of everybody; he wields, at will, a money power that gives him vast influence here, and controls some of the greatest operations of other States; and as for religious freedom, why, “he sits under his vine and under his fig-trees, and none dares to make him afraid.”

Emboldened by these concessions, he now demands to become a law-giver for Christian England;—but there I pause, and tell him that “between him and me there is a great gulf fixed.” I cannot help it. With “the true faith of a Christian” are bound up all my hopes of happiness here and hereafter; while that faith is to the Jew a stumbling-block, lying ever in his way, when he would act as a legislator for the Christian. What is heavenly truth to me, is gross falsehood and imposture to him; what inspires me, blights him; for he sees in it only impiety and blasphemy. How, then, can we act together, while our sanctions, our impulses, our objects, are different? And how can our Legislature be expected thus to become “a fountain sending forth, at the same place, sweet water and bitter”?

Sir, disguise and blink it though any one may, the Bill before us tends directly to obliterate and repudiate these vital differences—these vital principles—as sources of legislative inspiration and action; to place the Legislature of England on a footing which it has never occupied before. It seeks to effect an organic change in our political structure, involving its whole character and constitution—it would alter the distinguishing characteristic of our State, and of its sovereignty—by either eliminating from it an essential constituent, or introducing a foreign, incongruous, and destructive element. What is meant by the sovereignty of a State? Its supreme power or authority—in other words, its legislature; for sovereignty and legislation are convertible terms. Where the power of legislation resides, is the seat of sovereignty, and in legislation, you see sovereignty in action. And as a State is as much a moral being as any one of the individuals who constitute it—a moral being, whose voice is its laws; it is guided by certain motives and objects; it has a character, involved in, prescribing, and guaranteeing its course of conduct.

Now, what is the great and glorious characteristic distinguishing our State of England? Christian, essentially and professedly Christian, if there be any meaning in words, and any reality for words to represent. Founded and built up during a long succession of ages, by Christians exclusively, it derives its character from their principles, feelings, and convictions; the holy gospels illuminate every chamber of the building; the Christianity which they enshrine is the very key-stone of the arch of our laws and institutions, supplying vital sanctions; we legislate on its principles, and in its spirit; no one has ever entered the legislative chamber but under an express pledge, or absolutely necessary implication, of Christian belief; we are always summoned to consult concerning the welfare of the Church of Christ; we begin our daily deliberations with prayers offered to, and through, the mediation of the adorable Head of that Church; the prayers of this Christian country daily ascend on our behalf to Him, like incense, and England feels that those prayers have been answered; or how could this nation have become so great and glorious? Again, the Sovereign, on ascending the Throne of these realms, gives the most solemn pledge conceivable, of fidelity to Christianity; kneeling, placing her hands on, and kissing the holy gospels, Queen Victoria swore upon them, as all her ancestors have done, “to maintain, to the utmost of her power, the true profession of the gospel.” What would be thought of some future Sovereign wishing that oath to be omitted, as he had no faith in the gospel, but, on the contrary, believed it false? Would he be a Christian King? or allowed to sit on this ancient and glorious Throne of England! Never! And would that be a Christian Legislature of which such an apostate was, in Lord Coke’s language, caput, principium, et finis? Well, and how is it with the other two branches of the Legislature? For 150 years no one has ever sat in either House who had not avowed, on his solemn oath, his Christian belief, unless he has been relieved from doing so under circumstances demonstrative of his fidelity to Christianity. About the Roman Catholic there can, of course, be no question; and Quakers, Moravians, and Separatists, are relieved from taking any oath, absolutely for no other reason than their scrupulous and reverent obedience to a supposed command of their Divine Redeemer! In the case of the excellent Mr. Pease, he expressly declared before a Committee of this House, on oath, in 1850, “I agree in matters of faith with the Church of England, though not as regards her discipline and rites.” And beyond the 150 years to which I have referred, our earliest records show that Members were sworn on either some symbol of the Christian faith, or the holy Gospels. Having regard to all this, how can I concur with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford, who, in his powerful and elaborate speech in 1848, in this House, declared that—simply because we had latterly enlarged our borders, so as to include all classes of persons “calling and professing themselves Christians”—our Legislature is no longer exclusively Christian? Sir, with sincere respect for the right hon. Gentleman, I deny it altogether, and challenge proof of such an assertion. I affirm the contrary, and aver that every existing Member of either House is estopped from denying it, by the oath he has taken. It is true, a man may possibly stand at that table, and in his eagerness to obtain a so greatly coveted seat here, be frightfully guilty of repeating, as true, words which he disbelieves. If he do, I cannot help it; to his own master he standeth or falleth; to Him, his Almighty judge, he must answer in the last day. There is no oath that can be devised or administered which an impious man may not violate or take falsely. But, Sir, look closely into what we are required to do. When challenged to it, we must deliberately and solemnly discard that only visible safeguard of our Christianity, which now keeps out the Jew—and not only him, but the Mahomedan, the pagan, and, worse than all, the avowed apostate infidel—who plainly avows that ours is a false form of religion. Now, Sir, what are all the convulsive struggles of the Jew to get rid of these—to him—excruciating words, “on the true faith of a Christian,” but really so many evidences of their inestimable value to us, and of the paramount necessity of retaining them? Surely, surely! if the defenders of a beleagured fortress saw the besiegers steadily concentrating their fire on a particular point, would not that show the immense importance they attached to effecting a breach there, and make the besieged instantly direct their utmost energies to protecting and strengthening the point so seriously menaced? And what would be their joy to discover suddenly that it was, in fact, their strongest point—that there was a secret, and, to themselves, unsuspected means of defence? And, Sir, thus I regard this famous expression, “on the true faith of a Christian,” peremptory, stringent, and comprehensive as it is; though, undoubtedly, not originally used expressly for that purpose, it now constitutes a solid buttress, the strength of which has been tested, to the citadel of our Christianity. I thank God that the words are on our Statute-book; I am trying to keep them there; but, after all, they are simply declaratory of what was always there, significant of the essence and spirit of our constitution. It reminds me, in this respect, of Sir Edward Coke’s fine observation on the oath of allegiance, which, he says, is but an external profession of what the finger of the law had already written in the heart of every subject.

As we, Sir, are a Christian State, if such a thing there can be, let us test the argument on which the present claim is founded, by putting the case of a Jewish State, consisting exclusively of sincere and zealous Jews. Let us imagine an equally sincere and zealous Christian demanding a seat in the Sanhedrim, and that, to enable him to take his seat, an oath pledging its members to “the true faith of a Jew” should be abrogated. What consternation in the Sanhedrim! Would it be done? or regarded as impiously presumptuous? How mightily would they reason out of their ancient scriptures to show that, were they to yield, they would be false to their faith, and abrogating the high and holy law under which, at an awful juncture, the high-priest rent his clothes, saying, “he hath spoken blasphemy!” and he was judged guilty of death. They would say, no; we cannot, we dare not do it; we should cease to be a Jewish State—our purity would be defiled—we should have introduced a new and corrupting element, and be recognising claims which the word of God commands us to hold in abhorrence. Is not this, Sir, an exact

And, moreover, if it be, what becomes of the favourite argument derived from the small number of Jews who might be introduced? It is nothing—it is an impertinence. Is this, I beg to ask, the way to reason on principle? Admit a solitary Jew, of right, as such, and the exclusive distinguishing principle—the very bond of our being, as a Christian State—is gone; you have surrendered at discretion, and the Jew will proclaim his victory to the uttermost parts of the earth, where you are busied propagating the Christianity over which he has triumphed! And he will presently tell you that you must alter and surrender a good deal more to meet his views!—the prayers, for instance, with which we commence our daily deliberations, and which he will regard as offensive and insulting to his faith. “One of the unavoidable consequences of this measure,” said the late Sir Robert Peel, in opposing the first Jew Bill in 1830, “will be, that every one of the forms and ceremonies which give us assurance of Christianity must be abolished.” And let me ask with unspeakable anxiety, that you would consider what effect that would have on public opinion—that public opinion on which, as Mr. Hume truly tells us, all Governments of whatever form are founded. It would probably soon lead to lowering the influence of Christianity on that public opinion, and, once lowered there, how long will it continue as a vital principle in the State?

But, Sir, even this is not all. What a perilous precedent we are called upon to establish! Consider the principle you will be sanctioning: one loosening the very foundation of oaths, which have been in all ages, and under the express sanction of Scripture, used for the highest and most momentous purposes known among men. Why do you exact an oath from the Sovereign? Why from a legislator? Because, by the act of becoming such, he is incorporated with the sovereignty of the State, and contributes individually to determine its character and action. He is, while acting in that capacity, under only moral sanctions, amenable to the dictates of his conscience, and of God alone. And before investing him with such, comparatively speaking, irresponsible power, it is reasonable and right that we should require—for a guarantee of his character and acts as a legislator, and as evidence against him in case of treachery—that he should publicly and solemnly call God to witness that he holds such and such a belief, and will pursue such and such a course of action. Now, Sir, if a Jew is to be relieved from the Christian's oath, because he says, "I do not believe in him whom you call God," what—I implore you to consider—are you to answer by and by, when your approaches are defiled and darkened by a very different character, who says, holding this Bill in his hand, "Now admit me! and without any oath at all! For, as the Jew does not believe in the God of the Christian, I do not believe in the God of the Jew! I believe in no God at all!" Are you to admit the impious applicant? And yet claim to be deemed a godly—or will you become professedly, a godless Legislature?

Sir, I foresee disastrous consequences dependent on the course we are this night called upon to adopt. I content myself, however, with one, vouched by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford, in 1843. After admitting that our having to legislate on matters of religion, and concerning the Church, constituted a real and practical difficulty in the way of admitting Jews to seats in this House, he stated that, undoubtedly, one direct result to which such a step would lead, would be the separation between the Church and the State! Now, Sir, is the House—is the country—prepared for such a result? one which I believe would be a sort of social suicide; and tend to the dissolution of the State itself!

Sir, for these reasons and many others which I could assign, but that I perceive the anxiety of the House to come to a division, I can never bring myself to sanction the admission of the Jewish element into the Christian Legislature. I entreat hon. Members, in conclusion, to consider carefully the consequences, immediate and remote, direct and indirect, of assenting to the Bill as it lies before us, and without the Amendments of my hon. and learned Friend (Sir F. Thesiger) a step which undoubtedly will open the doors of the Legislature of this Christian country to Mahomedans, and pagans, and even professed infidels, as well as Jews, and the effect of which will be, I fear, fatally to affect the national faith, and in so doing sap the foundations of the national greatness.

MR. BYNG said, he should support the third reading of the Bill as he considered the effect of the existing oath was to exclude from the House Members of the Jewish persuasion who had been returned by large and important constituencies, and whose conscientious scruples prevented them from taking the oath in its present, although they were ready to take it in a modified, form; while it did not exclude persons who rejected the Scriptures as the revealed word of God, and who, disregarding the solemn obligation of oaths, were ready to subscribe to them.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE said, it was admitted on all sides, that all parties were ashamed of the oath of abjuration, and there was no occasion to discuss that question any longer. It was therefore to be hoped that the country would no longer see 654 gentlemen professing to represent the intelligence of the people, and a large number of high and distinguished persons representing the hereditary wisdom of the nation, solemnly calling upon God that they abjured any allegiance to persons who they knew had long ceased to exist. It appeared, however, that Gentlemen opposite admitted that it was not the family of the Stuarts of whom they were apprehensive, but that they had an insurmountable objection to the house of Rothschild. But the hon. and learned Gentleman (Sir F. Thesiger) who had moved the Amendment had not told the House how he got over the difficulty of the citizens of London having returned a Jew to Parliament. The citizens of London did not participate in the prejudices of the hon. and learned Gentleman, and they had returned a Jew to represent them in Parliament during nine sessions and two Parliaments. It was degrading to the representative of the city, insulting to the citizens of London, and humiliating to the House of Commons that matters should remain as they were. Suppose that 100 Members of the Jewish persuasion were returned by the constituencies of this country, would the House allow matters to continue in their present state? The hon. and learned Gentleman had alluded to the fact that the Lord Mayor of London had attended at St. Paul's on Thanksgiving-day. He was afraid he should shock the hon. and learned Gentleman much more when he told him that Christian congregations in the city sometimes selected churchwardens of the Jewish persuasion to administer the affairs of a Christian Church. Mr. Keeling, a Gentleman of the Jewish persuasion, had been elected churchwarden for two parishes—St. George, Botolph Lane, and St. Magnus the Martyr—on two or three occasions. He wrote for information on the subject, and received a letter from Mr. Keeling, which he would take leave to read to the House:—

“Dear Sir,—The parishes I have represented are St. George, Botolph Lane, and St. Magnus the Martyr, London Bridge; to the latter I was re-elected on Easter Tuesday last. The duty involves the safe guardianship of the church, and properties connected therewith; the proper observance of the service in conformity with existing laws; to levy rates for its support, and, if necessary, to enforce the payment of them; to report to the bishop of the diocese any neglect of duty on the part of the ministers; and the declaration made before the registrars of the bishop to carry out these regulations is framed in so liberal a spirit that it has been most conscientiously subscribed to by me, in company with my Christian colleague, without the least sacrifice of my religious scruples. I may say I have faithfully performed the duties of the office to the satisfaction of the rectors and the parishioners generally.”

But that was not all. Two or three Sundays ago the Bishop of Lichfield preached a sermon in the church of St. Magnus the Martyr, on behalf of the education of the children of the parish. The Lord Mayor attended there also, and it was of course the duty of the Hebrew churchwarden to receive the bishop with all the honours of the Church. The Bishop left the church without being un-christianised, a subscription was made and Christian education was aided by the exertions of the Jewish churchwarden. He believed that the cause of religion would not suffer very materially if they allowed some few members of the Jewish persuasion to have seats within the walls of the House of Commons. He was glad upon this occasion to see the noble Lord the Member for the City of London come to the rescue. Last year the noble Lord seemed to despond, but he hoped there was now some reason for believing that this question would be settled during the present Session in the other House of Parliament. It must be remembered that an unreformed Parliament had repealed the Test and Corporation Acts, and had conceded Catholic emancipation. He hoped that a reformed Parliament would not perpetuate the last relic of bigotry and intolerance which prevented the admission of Jews into the British Legislature.

The House divided:—Ayes 159; Noes 110: Majority 49.

Bill passed.

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY BILL.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

Clause 27 (Colleges to have power to frame Statutes).

MR. STAFFORD said, he wished to move, by way of Amendment, the omission from the clause of the words, “without prejudice to any existing interest of any member of such college.” He trusted that the Government, notwithstanding those words were in the Oxford Bill, would enable the fellows and masters—in short, the governing body of the colleges at Cambridge, to set a better example (by the omission of those words) than that of occupying the invidious position of showing themselves willing to inflict on others that which they would be unwilling to bear themselves.

MR. BOUVERIE said, that those words were in the Oxford University Act, and had been introduced into the Bill from a respect for the vested interests which the masters and fellows of colleges had in their offices and fellowships. He believed that in the long run the ultimate advantage of these institutions would be promoted by respecting those interests.

Amendment negatived.

MR. HEYWOOD said, he thought that the Statutes hereafter to be framed by the governing bodies of the colleges ought to be in the English instead of the Latin language. He should therefore move the insertion of the words “in the English language” after the word “Statutes” in the same clause.

MR. BOUVERIE said, he thought the matter might be safely left to the Cambridge authorities. If they liked to make their Statutes in the Latin language, it was to be hoped that Cambridge men, including his hon. Friend, would be able to read them. He thought it would be better that the Statutes should be made in English, but he did not think it desirable for Parliament to make a stringent rule on the subject.

Question put, “That those words be there inserted.”

The Committee divided:—Ayes 58; Noes 74: Majority 16.

MR. WIGRAM said, he would move the insertion after the word “following” of the words, “due regard being always had to the main designs of the founder or donor.” His object was not to abridge the powers given to the governing bodies of colleges, but to prevent them from disregarding the intentions of the founders. As an instance of the abuse to which the powers granted in the Bill might give rise, he would refer to the 30th clause, which enabled the University to make new rules with regard to endowments, among which was specified the endowment of the offices of Christian preacher and Christian advocate. Now he should not be averse to new rules which were in keeping with the intentions of the original founders, but if the endowments he had just alluded to were to be applied to a professorship of chemistry or botany, or the like, such an application would be a gross and most unjust disregard of the views and intentions of the founder. He denied that Parliament had morally any right to interfere with these endowments without adhering to the conditions upon which the donors gave them. The words he proposed to insert in the clause were not exactly to be found in the Oxford University Act, yet in that measure there was a plain intention that regard should be had to the designs of the founders. The principle he asserted was, that if you accepted a gift of this kind, you were bound to abide by the conditions annexed. That principle ought to be equally observed, in his opinion, even in the case of what were called "local preferences." It was objected, that if you adhered to these local preferences you might be inflicting upon a college persons not qualified by their learning to become members of the college. That, however, was a fallacy, because it had been repeatedly held that, whatever conditions of this kind were annexed to a college benefaction, there was always also annexed to it the implied condition that a person should be dignus—that he should be a suitable person to introduce into the college—and unless, therefore, he were a person of that sort the college would not be compelled to award him any of those emoluments. Another objection urged to the principle he sought to maintain was, that it might throw you back upon obsolete schemes long since fallen into desuetude. Such an argument, it was his belief, had no foundation whatever. In all those cases the reason why the old practice had fallen into disuse was because, from the change of circumstances it had become unsuitable to the present time, and if it had become unsuitable and inapplicable to the present state of things, he was quite willing that it should be altered. To meet the objection he had alluded to, he was ready, if it were desired, to adopt an express provision that, in determining what were to be considered the main designs of the founders, any scheme or regulation which had fallen into disuse for a period of, say fifty years, should not be regarded. Nothing was further from his intention than to drive back those foundations to forgotten usages which would be unsuitable to the time and contrary to the interests of the University. The principle involved in his Amendment was a very grave one, and he trusted that it would have the favourable consideration of the Government. He proposed it with no desire to impair the efficacy of the Bill, or to diminish the fair powers which were to be given to the Colleges or the University, but merely for the purpose of maintaining those powers within a reasonable limit, and to prevent the establishment of a precedent which might be made use of in other cases to the prejudice and subversion of the just rights of property.

MR. BOUVERIE said, he willingly admitted that this was an important question, and he thought that a great deal of the efficiency of the Bill would depend on the clause being retained without the addition of the proposed Amendment. The hon. and learned Member (Mr. Wigram) seemed to give up his whole case when he said that, with respect to many of the foundations, lapse of time had rendered them useless. Now there was one question he would ask the hon. and learned Gentleman: how could the main design of a founder, who existed 200 or 300 years ago, be ascertained? If expressed, it was either in accordance with the general objects of education or not. If the design was not in accordance with those objects, it ought not to be maintained; and where the design was not expressed it must be assumed to be for the promotion of education. The main design, as expressed, of the founder of Queen's College, was, that his soul and the soul of his Queen should be prayed for; and this showed the impropriety and absurdity of making it imperative to regard the designs of the founders. Was it not a monstrous case of abuse that King's College, with a magnificent income of £26,000 a year, should only turn out at the rate of three Bachelors of Arts per annum? The fellows and scholars there were obliged to swear that they would do their best to oppose the spread of the errors of John Wickliffe, and Reginald Peacock, Bishop of Chichester in the time of Henry VI.; but those errors as they were called, were now held by members of the Church of England. Therefore, one of the main designs of the founder was to oppose those very opinions which it was the present object of the University and Colleges to promote. That was the case with respect to those two Colleges, and also with respect to many others, and it was too late at the present day to insist on the observance of the main designs of the founders. It must happen that in the course of time the objects of the founders became useless or even mischievous, and therefore the funds ought to be devoted to other purposes. Consequently, the Committee in dealing with those trusts, must be influenced by no other motive but a desire for the public advantage and utility, and unless they were dealt with on that ground they had better not be dealt with at all. The practical result of the Amendment would be to restrict the freedom of the Colleges, as, at present, in many instances, the original designs of the founders were disregarded.

MR. WALPOLE said, that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bouverie) appeared to think that the insertion of the words proposed by his (Mr. Walpole's) hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Wigram) would do away with the whole effect of the Bill. Now he thought that the experience of the Oxford University Act had entirely removed all ground for any such apprehension. The endowments of colleges were as much property as any which could be held by any Member of that House, and the rights of that description of property had always been held as sacred as those connected with the property of individuals, and to trench upon those rights would be to trench upon the rights of property itself. The right hon. Gentleman said that, if it were found that any of those donations were at present applied in a manner either useless or mischievous, it would be to the public advantage to take them away or alter them so as to make them useful. Now, who was to do that? Were the Colleges or the Commissioners to do it? He could conceive that the Colleges might be allowed, with the sanction of their visitors, and subject to such rules as Parliament might lay down, to alter the character of their own property; but he could not understand that the Commissioners should have such a power conferred upon them. Why, it would be a greater power than had ever been bestowed on any body before. The right hon. Gentleman had referred to donations for praying for the souls of the founders; but that was the exception, and not the rule; and, because alterations might be necessary in one or two cases, that was no reason for conferring such arbitrary powers on the Commissioners, powers which would enable them to alter the character of the trust upon which the property was originally given. If such a principle were recognised, the result would be to deter persons from dispensing their bounty as they did at present upon many most charitable and beneficial objects. It was said that there was no power of finding out the designs of the founders; but actual experience proved that the Court of Chancery was every day administering trusts according to the designs of the founders of them, and the effect of the introduction of the proposed words into the present clause would not be to prevent any absurd or useless provisions from being done away with, but it would show, to the Colleges first, and afterwards to the Commissioners, that they did not possess an absolute power of dealing with this property without any regard to the original trust. He, therefore, trusted that the right hon. Gentleman would not object to the Amendment, and he entreated the Committee to have a proper respect for the trusts, in which in fact they had an equal and an individual interest.

MR. HEYWOOD said, he objected strongly to the introduction of the words. With regard to the fear that had been expressed by hon. Gentlemen, that persons would be deterred from making any donation for benevolent purposes, he could only say that the Legislature would be well employed in discouraging persons from making foolish gifts, nominally for benevolent purposes, but in reality that they might see their names written in letters of gold, to the detriment of their families and friends. To take an example of the absurdity of the old institutions, Mr. Macaulay, before being admitted to a fellowship, had sworn to devote himself to the study of theology, or else after a certain period to relinquish his fellowship; but could any one believe that that distinguished man intended to devote himself to that study? The character of the property of the Universities had been frequently changed, and there was no reason why it should not be changed now if such a change would tend to the public advantage.

MR. WHITESIDE said, that the scope of the hon. Gentleman's argument was this—that the study of theology, which had regard to our highest interests, was foolish, and ought to be discouraged. He considered those observations as more worthy of the worst days of the National Assembly of France than of the English House of Commons. He presumed that the study of "geology" was that study which the hon. Gentleman would wish to substitute. The drift of the hon. Gentleman's argument was evidently to discourage the study of theology among the youth of this empire. If a founder left a sum of money to a college for the teaching of the Christian religion that was a lawful purpose, and was one with which Parliament ought not to interfere. Those foundations had already produced the greatest lights of the Church, and it would be absurd to contrast any men of the present day with the distinguished divines of former days. He denied that endowments for the promotion of various branches of education were an encouragement to superstition; and he put it to the Committee to say whether, if a man were to endow a foundation for the study of the works of Roger Bacon, it could be viewed in that light? He would support any Amendment which had for its object the preservation of those time-honoured and valuable institutions. The worst argument he had ever heard against the words proposed was the argument of the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Heywood); and if he had had any doubt as to the necessity for the insertion of those words that doubt would have been removed by the argument of the hon. Member. Cambridge University possessed many valuable and useful endowments, and though the hon. Member had asserted that these were the fruits of the vanity of the founders, it ought to be kept in view that but for such persons this country would not have possessed the noble charities for which it was remarkable.

MR. BOUVERIE said, he would point out that, of the 700 or 800 scholarships belonging to the University, 400 were restricted. Although those restrictions might be wise and salutary when they were first founded, they had become useless and prejudicial by the lapse of time, and Parliament, he considered, had now a perfect right to deal with them in the manner which it thought most likely to be beneficial to the promotion of education. As a test of the comparative value of open and restricted scholarships, he might mention that of holders of the open scholarships at Trinity one in every four got a fellowship, while, of the Westminster scholars at that college, only one in twenty-two got a fellowship. The Amendment of the hon. and learned Member had a much wider operation than the words in the Oxford University Act to which he had referred, for while those stated that the observance of the wishes of the founders should be one of the objects of the statute, those words would override the statute altogether.

MR. J. G. PHILLIMORE said, he had listened with great pain to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, a speech which would have been a great deal more in place on the other side of the Atlantic than in the English House of Commons. He had not, however, been in the least surprised at the observations of the hon. Member for North Lancashire (Mr. Heywood). That hon. Gentleman avowed that he wished to discourage charitable bequests, and he had certainly taken the surest mode of doing so. The hon. Gentleman reminded him of a saying of Montesquieu, who observed that a certain tribe of savages, when they wanted to gather fruit, cut down the tree. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bouverie's) remarks with respect to the Westminster scholars was exceedingly unfair; because, as he had himself admitted, a great number of the Westminster boys went to Christchurch. Besides, he denied that the obtaining of fellowships was necessarily a test of eminence. Amongst the Westminster boys who did not become fellows was no less a man than John Dryden. He would remind the right hon. Gentleman, also, of the dictum of a great American jurist, and one who had certainly no superstitious fondness for English institutions—he meant Chancellor Kent. That great Judge said that these very collegiate institutions were "amongst the most interesting and meritorious trusts which could possibly be created and confided to men." When he (Mr. Phillimore) was taunted with the great commentators whom the German Universities had produced, he would point in reply to the debates in that House, to the great men who had adorned it, to the useful laws they had passed, and to the great constitutional principles they had established. It was in the Colleges of England that the minds of our statesmen were trained; and he believed that just as in the middle ages those institutions were the means by which alone persons of humble origin might raise themselves, and earn a great name for themselves and their country, so in those times they were still the great means by which those who were not born of opulent and splendid families, might qualify themselves for the service of their country, and win for themselves such distinctions as society could bestow.

MR. T. CHAMBERS said, that for the last reason alleged by the hon. and learned Gentleman, he should oppose the Amendment. Besides, the words sought to be introduced were completely contradictory to the rest of the clause.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, that to judge from the arguments of hon. Gentlemen opposite who supported the proposal one would imagine that the Bill had for its object to suppress all these collegiate establishments—to apply their property to purposes altogether different from those to which it was now applied—and, in short, to deal with the University of Cambridge much in the same way that Henry VIII. dealt with religious houses. Now, certainly, nothing was further from the intention and object of the Bill than any such purpose. The Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Wigram) in his opinion, would really go to defeat the real purposes of the founders. The University of Cambridge had described itself as an institution for the promotion “of sound learning and religious education.” Those were the objects for which those estates had been left, but they had been left at a time when peculiar notions existed as to the best mode of accomplishing those objects. Some of the founders thought that the best method was to insist that no person should be a fellow unless he belonged to a particular county. Other restrictions of various kinds were imposed, tending to defeat the purposes of promoting sound learning and religious education, and to render the college less available for the purpose for which it was endowed. Every member of the University was aware of what had passed with regard to St. John’s College. Originally its fellowships were what were called close—that was, none but Lancashire, Cumberland, or Westmoreland men could obtain a fellowship. He recollected the time when that was changed. It appeared that there was a power in the visitor to alter the statute, which was defeating the main object of the founder. [“No, no!”] Well, it must be so construed according to the arguments they had just heard—namely, that however obsolete or absurd the conditions were which the founder attached to the grant they must for ever be observed. The spirit of the words proposed would go to rescind the opening of the fellowships of St. John’s, and would re-establish the system which the college itself had held to be prejudicial to education. If they wished the University of Cambridge to be as useful as possible in the diffusion of sound learning, they ought to leave the colleges at liberty to sweep away all those small, ridiculous, obsolete restrictions which tended to defeat what they were bound to consider were the main objects of the founders, and which prevented the University being so useful as it might be in promoting sound learning and religious education.

MR. WALPOLE said, that it was a little remarkable that, although the noble Lord (Lord Palmerston) advocated the omission of the words proposed, on the ground that the main object of the University was the promotion “of sound learning and religious education,” the clause, as it stood, would delegate, first to the Colleges and then to the Commissioners, a power to act in entire disregard to that object. There were no words requiring the Commissioners to make alterations only so as to promote “sound learning and religious education.” They might, if they pleased, direct the exercise of their power in a direction completely the reverse. With reference to what had fallen from the hon. and learned Member for Hertford (Mr. T. Chambers), he observed that the enacting part of the clause gave to the Colleges and Commissioners the power of making a great many alterations. The supporters of the Amendment did not wish to cripple that power in any way, but they wished to direct it, and the only mode by which they could direct it was to insert in the clause words indicating the direction which it ought to take.

MR. ROBERT PHILLIMORE said, that the test applied by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bouverie), of the small number of scholars from Westminster who obtained fellowships at Trinity, had no application to the present case. Lord Chief Justice Jervis and Mr. Justice Williams had been scholars at Westminster, but they had not obtained fellowships at Trinity. All that the words proposed to be inserted would do, would be merely to require that attention should be paid to the main objects of the founders. He should therefore vote against the clause.

MR. HENLEY said, that the noble

Lord at the head of the Government had described the object of the University as being the promotion "of sound learning and religious education," and he (Mr. Henley) supported the insertion of the words proposed because they appeared to him to secure the main object. It was clear that those who were sitting behind the noble Lord wished to get rid of the object which the noble Lord wished to secure. There was nothing in the Bill as it stood which would prevent the Colleges or Commissioners appropriating the college funds, not for the promotion "of sound learning and religious education," but for any purpose that might be uppermost in their minds. He could not understand why the insertion of the words proposed should be objected to.

MR. FORTESCUE said, he entertained an objection to the insertion of the words, on the ground that different meanings might be attached to them, according to the opinions or feelings of the persons who might have to carry out the provisions of the Bill, and would in all probability seriously affect the working of the measure.

MR. WIGRAM said, that his sole object in moving the Amendment was, that Parliament should not in appearance do anything to subvert what was the main intention of the founders. Unless some such safeguard were provided, he was convinced that many charities founded solely for the poor would pass into the pockets of the rich. The chance of a poor man getting his son into the University depended almost wholly on those local privileges. He would propose to vary his Amendment as follows:—

"Due regard being always had to the main designs of the founder or donor, so far as consistent with sound religion and learning."

MR. BOUVERIE: That makes it still stronger.

MR. WIGRAM said, his object was to ascertain whether the right hon. Gentleman had any words of his own to propose. If not, he should adhere to his Amendment as originally proposed.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 78; Noes 97: Majority 19.

MR. HEYWOOD said, he would now move to insert, in line 32 of the same clause, after the word "such," the word "headships." The object was to enable the Commissioners to make alterations with regard to the headships, as well as the fellowships and other emoluments.

MR. BOUVERIE said, he objected to the proposal. He thought that when a man got to the head he ought to remain there.

MR. HEYWOOD said, that his proposal would only affect future heads of colleges. He had corresponded with several masters of arts who were favourable to the alteration.

Question put, "That the word "headships" be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 41; Noes 145: Majority 104.

MR. HEYWOOD said, he wished to propose the insertion in line 43 of the same clause, after the words "for the" the words "encouragement of studies in modern history, practical science, and modern languages, and for the". His object was to introduce modern studies into the University of Cambridge. When he was there he wished to attend the lectures on modern history, but was told by his tutor that it would do him no good in the examinations. He understood that the Oxford Commissioners had proposed that in one of the colleges there a fifth part of the fellowships should be set apart for physical science. He therefore hoped the same thing would be done at Cambridge. His Amendment he considered was of importance with regard to Parliament itself, for he did not think that senators were well educated unless they were acquainted with modern history, practical science, and modern languages.

MR. BOUVERIE said, he fully admitted that it was very desirable that modern studies should be pursued at Cambridge, but the question was, how it could best be done. The Bill contained a general provision that colleges should have the power to introduce such studies as part of their course, and he thought that the object in view would be more effectually secured by a comprehensive provision of that kind than by the words proposed to be added to the clause by the hon. Gentleman.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 55; Noes 136: Majority 81.

MR. HEYWOOD said, he would now beg to propose, as an Amendment, that the following words should be inserted in the clause after the word "fellows," as one of the objects for which Statutes should be made—namely, "for exempting students who may conscientiously object to attend the existing Liturgical Services in the College Chapel from compulsory attendance. His desire was, that those who did not belong to the Church of England should not be compelled to attend its services. That rule was followed in Trinity College, Dublin.

MR. BOUVERIE said, he objected to the introduction of the words, because the general clause empowering the governing body to form Statutes would enable them to make such an arrangement as the hon. Gentleman proposed if they chose to do so; and he believed that in some of the colleges there would be no indisposition to take that course.

MR. HEYWOOD said, he did not believe the authorities of the colleges, though they possessed the power, would make such a Statute as he proposed.

Question put, that those words be there inserted.

The Committee divided; when there were, Ayes 90; Noes 128: Majority 38.

Clause, as amended, agreed to, as was also Clause 28.

Clause 29 (When Colleges omit to make Statutes, Commissioners may frame them.)

MR. WIGRAM said, he wished to move an Amendment, putting the election to the mastership of Jesus College on the same footing as that of Magdalen, and that the interest of the Bishop of Ely in such election should cease.

MR. BOUVERIE said, he must explain that the interest of the Bishop of Ely in Jesus College was to cease after the death of the present Bishop.

MR. HENLEY said, he could not see how they were to separate the nomination of the living which was attached to Jesus College from that of the mastership.

MR. FORTESCUE said, he would now beg to move an Amendment taking away the power, now given to two-thirds of the governing body of any college, to negative the recommendation of the Commissioners. No body about to be reformed by the provisions of such a Bill as the present, was likely to carry the reform out with such a power of a veto given to them. It was holding out a temptation to the Colleges at Cambridge to thwart the objects of the Bill. When a similar clause was introduced into the Oxford University Bill it was not part of the original Bill, but adopted by the Government when they found that they could not help it—when they had great difficulties in carrying the measure, and were obliged to conciliate on all sides. It was a mere concession to the opposition, and assuredly no part of the views of the promoters of the Bill. The noble Lord even said that the proviso would impair the objects of the Bill, and oblige them to come in two or three years to that House for an amended Bill. It was well known in Oxford that the proviso had been a serious hindrance to the operation of the Bill. The governing body of new College had exercised their veto against a scheme of the Commissioners for throwing open the scholarship of the College, now confined to students from Winchester. St. John's College would most likely follow the example, in vetoing the scheme for throwing open the scholarships now almost entirely given to Merchant Tailors' School. Jesus College would most probably do the same thing. He therefore appealed to the Committee to remove so serious an embarrassment to the working of the Bill.

Amendment proposed in page 9, line 16, to leave out from the word "thereof" to the end of the clause.

MR. BOUVERIE said, he would admit that if he had framed the Bill without the precedent of the Oxford Act, he would hardly have introduced the proviso; but it must be remembered that the subject had been fully discussed during the progress of the Oxford University Bill and a very strong feeling existed in favour of the introduction of a proviso of this nature.

SIR WILLIAM HEATHCOTE said, it was true that in the case of the Oxford Act the Government endeavoured to conciliate the Opposition by abandoning minute legislation, but he was not aware that they ever disputed the necessity of affording some protection to the colleges against the otherwise irresponsible power of the Commissioners. With respect to the refusal, or rather intimation of dissent, from New College relative to Winchester School to the scheme of the Commissioners to deal with those institutions together, he was prepared to assert that such refusal or dissent was justified upon the ground of the scheme being injurious to a place of learning and education.

MR. GORDON said, that the Amendment, if carried, would not only deprive the colleges of all opportunity of objection, but would absolutely leave them in ignorance of the Statutes by which they were to be governed.

Question put—"That the words 'Provided always, That all such Statutes' stand part of the clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 165; Noes 93: Majority 72.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 30.

MR. WALPOLE said, he wished to move the insertion of the words "sound learning and religious education."

MR. HEYWOOD said, he should oppose the Amendment. He believed that, according to the interpretation of the University authorities, "sound learning" would be found to mean a Greek and Latin education; and a "religious education," the religious teaching of the Church of England. Now, he was in favour of modern studies being introduced into the University, and he was still more decidedly in favour of Dissenters being admitted to all its honours. He certainly, therefore, could not approve of the Amendment.

MR. BOUVERIE said, it was his opinion that "sound learning" did not mean Latin and Greek exclusively, though he believed religious teaching would mean that of the Church of England.

MR. T. CHAMBERS said, he would suggest that, for consistency's sake, "religious education" should be introduced into Clause 28.

MR. J. G. PHILLIMORE said, he did not see why the words "sound learning" and "religious education" should be objected to.

MR. BOUVERIE said, he would look at the clause, and also at the words proposed to be inserted in the 28th clause, and state what he thought should be done.

Clause agreed to.

MR. WALPOLE said, the clause, as drawn, would operate thus:—The University would have the power of making Statutes within two years, and if they did not do so the Commissioners would have power to make Statutes until 1860; after which the University would again have the power of making Statutes, and, consequently, might undo all that the Commissioners had done. Now that, he maintained, was not a very satisfactory state in which to leave the University with respect to the Commission. What he desired to propose was, that they should do one of two things,—either omit the clause altogether, or leave the Commissioners power to make alterations, if the University failed, provided two-thirds of the governing body of the University agreed to such alterations.

MR. BOUVERIE said, he objected to omit the clause altogether. It was proposed to give the Commissioners power to deal with the Statutes—first with the Royal Statutes, and next with the Statutes connected with the endowments. He was ready to concede a power to the colleges to dissent from any Statutes proposed by the Commissioners with respect to endowments, but not with regard to the Royal Statutes.

MR. WIGRAM said, he could not conceive how the proviso, giving the University power to object to the alteration of all Statutes, was open to objection. If ever there were a body which deserved confidence it was the University of Cambridge. There never had been a corporation which had shown more alacrity to adopt improvements.

MR. HEYWOOD said, he would remind the Committee that the University of Oxford had recently determined that the Professor of Anatomy should sign the Thirty-nine Articles. He believed the Professor of Anatomy was about the last person to believe the Thirty-nine Articles; and that if we took the medical profession throughout the country, ninety-nine out of a hundred did not believe in those Articles. The Commissioners objected to the test of the Thirty-nine Articles; but if the Committee allowed two-thirds of the Council to object, they might have a similar case occurring at Cambridge. At present Dissenters were admitted there even without a revision of the Statutes.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 32, Right of preference belonging to schools not to be abolished in certain cases if two-thirds of the governing body of the schools dissent therefrom.

MR. FORTESCUE said, he should move the omission of the clause. The clause gave power to schools as well as colleges to defeat the whole object of the Bill, by enabling two-thirds of the schools to put a veto on any clauses for reform proposed by the Commissioners. It did not follow logically that because the Committee had rejected his Amendment on the former clause they should object to his Motion now, to omit the clause from the Bill.

MR. ROUNDELL PALMER said, that having proposed and carried a similar clause in the Oxford Bill to that which the hon. Gentleman now proposed to omit, he hoped the Committee would not take a course so grossly inconsistent as to refuse to the schools connected with Cambridge the same privilege which they had given to the schools and colleges connected with the sister University. It appeared to be a gross oversight to forget the interests of the schools and minor places of education dispersed over the kingdom, and to fix attention exclusively on the Universities. Education was of general interest, promoted as much by schools as by Universities; and it appeared to him to be a short-sighted jealousy which would lead to the sacrifice of schools, even to promote some degree of advantage to the University. But the schools would certainly be sacrificed if they took away all the exhibitions and scholarships which had been established by the founders or masters of the schools or endowments, for the purpose of facilitating the passage into the Universities of youths educated in the schools. It would, in fact, amount to confiscation. The adoption of a clause of this kind in the Oxford Act had not resulted in any mischievous consequences, and he trusted the Committee would not stultify itself by agreeing to the Amendment.

MR. FORTESCUE said, that, as the Bill was at present framed, if the scheme proposed by the Commissioners was rejected, they had no other resource than to report the fact to the Secretary of State. He would therefore submit that a power of appeal should be given to them.

MR. WALPOLE said, he wished to know upon what ground should a right of appeal be given to the Commissioners? A power of appeal was only given to persons interested and affected by the matter in question; but the Commissioners were simply delegated to see that the powers of the University were properly put in motion.

MR. FORTESCUE said, he regarded the Commissioners as the representatives of the House of Commons, and that they had therefore quite as good a right to be heard before the Privy Council as any other party.

Clause agreed to; as were also Clauses 33 to 37, both inclusive.

Clause 38.

MR. ROBERT PHILLIMORE said, he wished to move the omission of certain words for the purpose of giving an appeal against any new Statutes to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, instead of five Members of the Privy Council, including two members of the Judicial Committee, a provision which had, he said, given rise to great difficulty in the case of the Oxford University.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he was not aware that any inconvenience had resulted from the provision in the Oxford Act. One petition only had been presented, which had been referred to five Members of the Privy Council, including two Members of the Judicial Committee, and by them disposed of satisfactorily.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 39. (The Statutes to be laid before Parliament, and unless an Address is within forty days presented by one or other House praying Her Majesty to withhold Her consent, it shall be lawful for Her Majesty, by Order in Council, to declare Her approbation of such Statutes.)

MR. HEYWOOD said, he wished to extend the time from forty days to four months, which would allow of a longer period for the consideration of the Statutes in Parliament, and would give to independent Members a better chance of obtaining a day on which to move an Address.

MR. BOUVERIE said, he would not object to sixty days being substituted for forty.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would reconsider the point. By this provision in the Bill it was not intended to reserve to Parliament the principal function of considering the Statutes in their particulars. The House of Commons was not at all fit for such an office; they provided a Commission to review the operations of the colleges in the way of legislation, or, if necessary, to assume to themselves the power of legislation; and the appeal to that House was only provided in the improbable case of some gross violation of the trust confided to them on the part of both the Commissioners or the University. He looked upon the period of forty days as ample for the object in view; a longer term would be very inconvenient to the colleges, as well as wholly unnecessary.

MR. COLLIER said, he should support the Amendment, which would afford a reasonable time to independent Members to move an Address, instead of leaving them at the mercy of the Government.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he thought it advisable that the practice should be the same both with regard to the Oxford and the Cambridge Statutes. There would always be ample opportunities during the period mentioned in the clause for independent Members to bring forward any Motion they might wish to submit to the House.

MR. WALPOLE said, that the object of making the House of Commons a Court of Appeal was to provide against the contingency of the Commissioners flying in the face of the Act. It was not intended as a general rule that the House of Commons should review the acts of the Commissioners.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 40.

MR. WIGRAM said, he objected to the power given to the Commissioners of sweeping away all the Statutes. There were many portions of the Elizabethan Statutes which he thought it might be desirable to retain. For instance, it was provided that no undergraduate should be expelled without the approbation of the majority of the heads of colleges. It was also provided that there should be a uniform system with regard to the taking of degrees. He could not see the necessity of arming the Commissioners with such a power in express terms.

MR. BOUVERIE said, he thought it better that the Commissioners should be enabled to deal with the code in a comprehensive manner.

MR. WALPOLE said, the clause was merely an intimation as to the nature of the Commissioners' functions.

DUBLIN METROPOLITAN POLICE BILL.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. VANCE said, he objected to the Bill on a point of form, as it proposed to give certain compensation charged on the Consolidated Fund, and therefore should have been introduced in a Committee of the whole House.

MR. SPEAKER said, that the hon. Member had raised the same objection a few nights before. He had examined the question, and found that the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 94, had removed those charges from the Consolidated Fund to the annual Estimates; and the Bill was therefore correct in point of form.

MR. SERJEANT O'BRIEN said, he would ask the Government whether, at that hour

—just one o'clock—it was decent to take a Bill with 185 clauses, objected to as it was by all parties in Dublin?

MR. HORSMAN said, he hoped the Bill would be allowed to pass a second reading. He believed it was not objected to on principle. It was only a consolidation Bill.

MR. GROGAN said, that he was surprised to hear such a statement. The Bill was vehemently objected to by the people of Dublin, and it was very different from a consolidation Bill. It extended the provisions of the Act it professed to consolidate; for example, as to enabling the Lord Lieutenant to include parishes in the police districts of the city within ten miles round it. The whole county might as well at once be included. Then, again, there was an extraordinary provision as to the police magistrates and police "Commissioners," as they were called in this Bill. To all intents the magistrates had hitherto been deemed as superior authorities; but this clause made them subordinate. It was so important, however, that a consolidation Bill, or some good Bill for the regulation of the police in Dublin should be adopted, that he was quite ready to make a compromise with the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for Ireland, which was this—that the Bill should be read a second time now and referred to a Select Committee, with power to examine witnesses, and decide on the course to be afterwards pursued. Let the right hon. Gentleman adopt that course, and he (Mr. Grogan) would agree to the second reading now. If not, he should feel it to be his duty to move, as an Amendment, that the Bill be read a second time that day six months. By taking that course he believed no injury would accrue either to the city of Dublin, or to the parties whom it was proposed to benefit by the Bill; whilst an opportunity would be given for making the measure satisfactory to all classes concerned. On the other hand, if the right hon. Gentleman proceeded with the Bill he was afraid that, in accordance with the wishes of the corporation and inhabitants of Dublin, he should have to give it all the opposition in his power. He begged to move, therefore, that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."

MR. HORSMAN said, if he were to accede to the proposal of the hon. Member for Dublin they would be unable to pass the Bill during the present Session. The objections that the hon. Gentleman made were rather objections of detail, which could be more properly discussed in Committee. It was, he maintained, only a consolidation Bill which had been drawn without any intention to alter the existing law, and if any alteration had been made, he was ready to remedy that in Committee.

MR. P. O'BRIEN said, that the citizens of Dublin entertained a general objection to the whole system of the police of that city, which they were anxious should not be sanctioned by the passing of any such Bill as that before the House. He particularly objected to the 149th clause, by which a constable was empowered to arrest a person without a warrant for, among other things, the use of obscene language. The other day, a number of persons were taken before the magistrates, of course by the direction of the Police Commissioners, charged with using such language, and, when questioned as to what that language was, a policeman replied that they had said, "Damn the police!"

MR. VANCE said, he thought there was a strong prima facie case against the Bill, inasmuch as it went directly in the face of the constituted authorities of Dublin.

MR. J. D. FITZGERALD said, that the objections to details which had been urged were the best reasons for going on with the Bill. They were all objections to the existing law, which if the Bill were not proceeded with, must remain unaltered; but which might, if they went into Committee, be amended. The Bill was substantially a consolidation Bill, reducing into one that which was now scattered over thirteen confused Acts of Parliament. At the same time it reduced the number of magistrates from nine to five, and thus tended to lessen the public burdens.

MR. WHITESIDE said, he was of opinion that the Bill should be referred to a Select Committee. He knew nothing more unmerciful, on the part of the Attorney General for Ireland, than to inflict this Bill, containing 185 clauses, on a Committee of the House. No doubt it would be a rich intellectual treat; but he thought, with so many details, the matter should be referred to a Select Committee.

COLONEL TAYLOR moved the adjournment of the debate.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he hoped the House would read the Bill a second time now, and leave the question of referring it to a Select Committee for future consideration. Of course the Government were open to receive, and ready to entertain, suggestions on the subject of the proposed change in the law.

MR. GROGAN said, he must complain that neither the corporation nor the magistracy of Dublin had yet had an opportunity of considering the Bill.

MR. P. O'BRIEN said, that the Bill was conceived in the same spirit as the Counties and Boroughs Police Bill, which English Members had so much opposed. For the sake, then, of consistency, he had a right to call upon English Members to oppose the precipitate second reading of the measure, which was just as much a blow against the principle of local self-government as the objectionable English Bill.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, it was of importance that the Bill should be got through in the course of the present Session; but that certainly could not be done if it were referred to a Select Committee, except under the assistance and forbearance of the House. No doubt the best tribunal for discussing the details of the Bill would be a Select Committee; but then, if that course were adopted, it must be understood that the House would accept the Bill as it came down from the Committee. However, the Government would rather that the Bill should be read a second time at once, and the question of referring it to a Select Committee reserved for future consideration.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Debate be now adjourned."

The House divided:—Ayes 52; Noes 65; Majority 13.

Question again proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

Whereupon Motion made, and Question put, "That this House do now adjourn."

The House divided:—Ayes 46; Noes 69; Majority 23.

Question again proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

Debate arising; Debate adjourned till Thursday.

NON-CONSECRATION OF BLANDFORD
BURIAL GROUND—EXPLANATION.

LORD PORTMAN begged permission to claim their Lordships' attention for a few minutes, on personal grounds, while he referred to a subject of which he had given the right rev. Prelate (the Bishop of Oxford) notice, and which related to certain statements made by himself and by the right rev. Prelate in the discussion which had arisen on Thursday last, on the refusal of another right rev. Prelate (the Bishop of Salisbury) to consecrate the Blandford burial-ground. He felt confident that the right rev. Prelate would be obliged to him for affording him the opportunity of correcting anything that might have fallen from him in the heat of debate, or owing to inaccuracy of memory. The right rev. Prelate, on the occasion alluded to, said he would put no confidence in certain "hear-say" statements which he (Lord Portman) had made. He (Lord Portman) now begged to state that the "hear-say" statements made by him on Thursday last had since been fully confirmed. He had made no pretence to making a statement to their Lordships, beyond that he himself believed it to be true; and he believed it on the character of the party who gave him the information. He (Lord Portman) stated that there was no communion table in the chapel of the cemetery at Woolwich, on the occasion when the right rev. Prelate opposite consecrated that ground. The right rev. Prelate, however, stated as an eye-witness that there was a communion table.—[The Bishop of OXFORD intimated dissent.]—The right rev. Prelate had certainly been very cautious in the way in which he alluded to the chapel at Woolwich,—at all events, he said there was "a table;" and as their Lordships were talking about communion tables, it might well be presumed that the right rev. Prelate meant that there was a "communion table." The right rev. Prelate, however, said that he did not precisely recollect whether there was a communion table or not in the chapel at Woolwich, since, whether the ceremony of consecration was according to his views or not, taking place as it did in the diocese of another Prelate—London,—he should not have thought it a point of conscience. Now, he (Lord Portman) submitted that the right rev. Prelate ought not to have proceeded in a ceremony not according to his own views, if he deemed his views to be essential and matter of necessity. He might quote great writers upon such a point, if he thought necessary, but he would not trouble their Lordships: he would only say that in his own opinion no man was warranted in doing what he thought to be wrong merely because he was acting as the deputy of another. In matters of total indifference—matters signifying nothing one way or the other—a man was at liberty to act as he pleased; but in matters of conscience and essence, the case was far otherwise. If, then, the right rev. Prelate thought that a communion table—and the celebration of the holy communion were essential to the consecration of the chapel and burial-ground at Woolwich—he could not understand how the right rev. Prelate could waive his own opinion in deference to that of the Bishop of London. The gentleman on whose authority he (Lord Portman) had made the statement had informed him that there was no communion service and no communion table on the occasion of the consecration of Woolwich burial-ground. But with the view of being perfectly accurate, he (Lord Portman) had written to the Clerk of the Burial-board, at Woolwich, requesting information as to the real state of the facts, and from the reply of that person he was sure the right rev. Prelate would admit that he had been mistaken. The reply of the Clerk of the Burial-board was in these words:—

"In reply to your note of the 7th, I beg to inform you that there is not a communion table in the chapel of the cemetery at Woolwich, and that the Holy Communion was not celebrated at the consecration of the burial-ground."

He (Lord Portman) found in a paper delivered this day, that the Chancellor of the Bishop of London receives a fee of five guineas for advising the Bishop whether the proceedings of every consecration were strictly legal, so that it was clear the Bishop of London was advised carefully that all is legally done, and he (Lord Portman) preferred to trust such advice rather than the caprice of the Bishop of Oxford. He wished to mention, also, that he had received a letter from a gentleman named Gray of Newbury, who was unknown to him, though he believed he was known to some of their Lordships, stating that he had paid much attention to the debate on Thursday last, and that he had been much struck by the remark of the Bishop of Oxford, in reference to what he had done at Woolwich as the deputy of the Bishop of London. Mr. Gray stated that some years ago the Bishop of Oxford had himself, in his own diocese—at Newbury—consecrated a burial-ground, in which not only was there no communion table, but not even a chapel. After hearing this he was sure the right rev. Prelate would be glad of the opportunity of putting himself right with their Lordships, especially as he had attributed to him a further inaccuracy in alleging that there was a difference of practice between the right rev. Prelate and the Bishop of Salisbury; with regard to whom he might be allowed to say, in passing, that he disclaimed every degree of ill-feeling, and the differences in whose diocese, arising out of the matter referred to on Thursday evening, were not unlikely to be adjusted by the kindly intervention of the Bishop of St. Asaph. Whatever rules the right rev. Prelate might say he made, no one could fail to observe that his practice was not uniform; those who watched him, and saw that he did not adhere to any rule, had a right to say that he did not insist on a communion table in a cemetery chapel, and had a right to believe that it was quite a matter of indifference, as no one would wish to attribute to him that he would yield to any temporary purpose what was really essential. He (Lord Portman) would now appeal to their Lordships whether he had been wrong in relying upon hear-say evidence in these matters, and whether his statements had not been confirmed by the testimony of others? He felt exceedingly sorry that he should have been held up to their Lordships as having furnished them with erroneous information; and he trusted they would excuse him for having given the right rev. Prelate an opportunity of putting himself right with the House on these subjects.

THE BISHOP OF OXFORD said, the noble Lord charged him with two inaccuracies; first, with having stated that there was a communion table in the chapel at Woolwich, when there was none; and, secondly, with having told the House that the usage in his diocese was the same as in Salisbury, when such was not the fact. Besides this, the noble Lord charged him with having violated his conscience (if his conscience were rightly informed) in adopting in the diocese of London the usage of that diocese when he was acting in behalf of the Bishop of London. As to the first of those charges, the facts were simply these:—When he went to the cemetery chapel at Woolwich, the form used in the diocese of London was put into his hand as the official document for his guidance. The rubric prefixed to that document provided that the Bishop, with his chaplain, should be received at the door of the church or chapel by the chancellor, registrar, minister, churchwarden, or others, and having proceeded in his robes to “the communion table,” the service of the day was then to be read by the officiating minister. Now, he had been duly received in the form here prescribed, had been conducted in his robes to a chair placed beside a table covered with a decent red cloth, and situated under the east window; his chaplain took his seat on the south side of the table; and the officiating minister then proceeded to read the service. He (the Bishop of Oxford) took it for granted that the table before his eyes was what the rubric called a communion table, and he appealed to their Lordships whether this was not a natural supposition, and whether it could be described by any other name? By to-day’s post, however, he had received from the rector of Woolwich a letter, stating that the noble Lord had submitted to him a string of interrogatories as to whether the table in question was not a common dining table? whether it was not covered by a green baize cloth?—and the like; in answer to which their Lordships had heard that it was a decent table, covered with a red cloth, such as these tables were commonly covered with. It certainly appeared now that this table was not intended to be left there; and in the letter to which he had referred the rector of Woolwich said,

“I have evidently led you into a mistake by the arrangement I made. As it was necessary that a table should be placed somewhere for your convenience, and the place under the east window was the most appropriate position for it, that part of the chapel was selected for the purpose. It certainly had all the appearance of a communion table.”

As to the second alleged misrepresentation, he (the Bishop of Oxford) had said, that the rule adopted in the diocese of Salisbury with regard to these consecra-tions was the same as that of his own diocese. This statement was strictly correct. It was true that many years ago, before he had considered the subject, he had consecrated the chapel at Newbury without a communion table. The service of his diocese had not been drawn up, and when speaking last Thursday, he certainly did not think it necessary to state that, when young in office and before he had considered the question, he had on one occasion not adhered to that rule. He did not think there was any material misrepresentation in this. As to the third charge, that he had violated his conscience, because in an essential matter a man had no right to do for another what he would not do for himself, this point all turned on the meaning of the word "essential." He held that by the canon law and by the law which the Church of England had established there was no complete consecration of a cemetery chapel or church without the celebration of the Holy Communion. The question was supposing the Bishop of London only consecrated the cemetery, and did not consecrate the cemetery chapel, was there any violation of principle in his saying that he would adopt the form used in the diocese of London, which left that chapel unconsecrated? In his own diocese he had consecrated cemeteries without any chapel in them, in cases where there was a difficulty on the part of the parishioners in building a chapel, and of course there was no Communion there. He certainly thought it a mistake that in any diocese a cemetery chapel should not be legally consecrated, so that it remained an unconsecrated building in a consecrated cemetery, but he thought he should be straining at a gnat if he refused his assistance to one of his right rev. brethren in performing a ceremony of this sort, because that right rev. Prelate thought proper to permit the existence of an unconsecrated chapel. The consecration service in the diocese of London did not set apart the cemetery chapel for the service of God; it simply dealt with the burial-ground about the chapel. He trusted that the noble Lord having stated that all his anger to his right rev. Friend had passed away, would, after the explanation which he had just offered, extend his amnesty to him. It was very painful to him to think that any noble Lord should entertain anything like a grudge towards him, and he could assure their Lordships that, although he had spoken strongly in defence of his right rev. Brethren, he had no intention of misrepresenting the noble Lord. For his own part, he felt strongly upon the subject. He had for ten years had the experience of the episcopal work in a large agricultural diocese, and he had found that the opening and consecration of churches and chapels was the only opportunity afforded to the Bishop to partake, in conjunction with his clergy and the leading members of the laity, of the holy sacrament. That practice had in his own diocese been attended with most beneficial results by giving rise to feelings of kindness, by removing fancied impressions of slights experienced, and by establishing a oneness in the Church of Christ, and he should therefore deeply regret anything which might tend to the discontinuance of the practice.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY said, that although this was an irregular conversation, he believed their Lordships would consider it of importance. Without entering into the controversy which had occupied the attention of their Lordships, he was anxious to inform the right rev. bench of Bishops of certain circumstances which had come to his knowledge, and which had been the cause of great inconvenience and of some ill-feeling, which he should be sorry to see exaggerated or continued. He alluded to the great uncertainty which prevailed in the public mind as to what was the feeling and opinion of the bench of Bishops generally on the subject of consecration. There was evidently a great difference of opinion among them as to the ceremonies to be observed on consecration. He himself lived in a large parish in which the churchyard had been closed, and at present they were without any cemetery; for it was considered desirable to have three cemeteries instead of one: but then the Act of Parliament required that they should build six chapels, and that they could not afford. The Act of Parliament with regard to consecration was different as applied to the country and to London, the words being obligatory as regarded the country. He was able to give ground for the formation of a cemetery, but not to build a chapel. His diocesan, who was held in universal esteem, was informed of this offer, but he declined to consecrate, on the ground that there was no chapel. Unless he had misunderstood the right rev. Prelate (the Bishop of Oxford), he had stated that he had in his time consecrated without a chapel or church. [The Bishop of OXFORD: Yes.] Then there appeared to be a difference between that right rev. Prelate and the Bishop of Winchester, although he did not pretend to decide who was right; but he thought that as every county in the kingdom was now occupying itself with the making of new cemeteries, this question of consecration ought to be set at rest. He, therefore, wished to ask the right rev. Prelate (the Bishop of Oxford) whether, as he had done so before, he would be prepared, under certain circumstances, to consecrate a cemetery in which there might not be a chapel? and also whether he would object to consecrate a private cemetery?

THE BISHOP OF OXFORD thought there was great inconvenience in being called upon to answer a question of that kind off-hand. In the single case in which he consecrated a cemetery without a chapel the circumstances were rather peculiar, because the ground was sufficiently near to the parish church to make it possible for parties to have that portion of the service which was usually read indoors performed there. It was at High Wycombe. The parishioners had recently built schools at a considerable expense; and then an order came from the Secretary of State for the formation of a cemetery; it was represented to him that the parishioners were hard pressed for money, and under these circumstances he consented to the use of the parish church, thinking it right, in the exercise of his discretion, to meet, as far as possible, the wishes of the ratepayers—taking from them a promise that they would erect a chapel in the cemetery at some future period. In the case of the Bishop of Winchester, to which the noble Earl had referred, the reason of the right rev. Prelate's refusal was, that the cemetery in question was situated at such a distance from the parish church as that it would be impossible for the poor, for whom it was principally intended, to have the burial service performed in the church. The noble Earl asked, would he consecrate a private cemetery? He could only say, it was a matter in which he would exercise his judgment, and his decision would depend entirely on the circumstances of the case. There might be cases in which he would think it advisable to exercise the discretion vested in him by law.

THE BISHOP OF CASHEL said, that the difference of opinion on this subject was even greater than had been stated.

If the right rev. Prelate was right in saying that the consecration of a church or chapel was ineffectual without the administration of the sacrament, he (the Bishop of Cashel) could only say that the greater number of chapels and churches which he had undertaken to consecrate were not consecrated, for he was never in the habit of administering the sacrament at the time of consecration, although he always gave directions that it should be celebrated the next Sunday. The Archbishop of the province in which his diocese was situated declared that a religious ceremony was not at all essential to consecration. The only real essential was the civil act by which the building was handed over for the purposes of divine service. He knew of cases in which the Archbishop of Dublin (who he might remind them was an Englishman, not a disorderly Irishman), the Prelate to whom he had referred, had walked into the church, signed the act of consecration, and then walked out again; and when asked why he had not read any prayers, replied, "Do you think that anything I could read would give to the building a holier character than it will derive from the fact of its being given up to the service of God?" He (the Bishop of Cashel) did not follow the example of the most rev. Prelate, but he must say there was no form of consecration in the Church service. Different prelates used different forms; he adopted that used in the diocese of London, but even it contained no command to administer the sacrament, and he believed the majority of the Prelates did not administer it at the time.

VISCOUNT DUNGANNON thought it was high time that some distinct understanding should be come to on this important matter. It was a very fearful and formidable thing to find this difference of opinion existing on one of the most solemn rites of the Church. He had heard with regret the observations which had fallen from the right rev. Prelate who had last spoken. That right rev. Prelate had alluded to a case of irregular and, he might even say, unhallowed consecration performed by the Archbishop of Dublin. Though he could not be insensible to the high attainments and the personal merits of that right rev. Prelate, still it must be admitted that there had existed, in his mind, strong peculiarities and opinions. When he filled a distinguished position in the University of Oxford these peculiarities manifested themselves, and he could not, therefore, attach much faith to his views on this question. However, this was a matter calling for decision, since it must necessarily give rise to doubts and feelings anything but pleasing or satisfactory if it remained in its present state.

LORD CAMPBELL respectfully suggested that, as there was no likelihood of the present conversation tending to edification, it had better be dropped.

House adjourned to Thursday next.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, June 10, 1856.

MINUTES.] NEW WRIT.—For Leicester Borough,
v. Richard Gardner, esq. deceased.
PUBLIC BILL.—1st Annuities Redemption.

CHELSEA BRIDGE.

SIR BENJAMIN HALL said, he had been asked a question on a former evening by the right hon. Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) respecting Chelsea bridge, and had promised to obtain further information. He found that a sum of £5,500 was advanced in 1853 towards the expenses of the bridge; and, on reference to an Act of Parliament passed in 1846, he further found the Treasury was authorised to advance £65,000, to be repaid from tolls to be levied upon the bridge. Therefore there would be tolls upon that bridge, and the proceeds, after repayment of the £65,000, would be devoted to the purposes of metropolitan improvements.

REFORM OF THE ECCLESIASTICAL COURTS—QUESTION.

MR. HADFIELD said, he would beg to ask the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General what course he intended to adopt respecting the Wills and Administrations Bills, when he intended to proceed with the same; and whether he considered that it would be prosecuted to an issue during the present Session?

THE SOLICITOR-GENERAL said, his noble friend at the head of the Government had promised him that Monday, the 23rd of that month, should be devoted to the second reading of the Ecclesiastical Courts Bill. It would be the first Order of the Day, and he hoped the second reading would then take place. He had agreed with the hon. and learned Member for East Suffolk (Sir F. Kelly) to make some modifications in the Government Bill, particularly with reference to facilitating the proof of wills by persons dying in the country, which he thought would render the prosecution of the hon. and learned Gentleman's Bill wholly unnecessary, and the hon. and learned Member for Plymouth (Mr. Collier) had said that if he were assured it was the intention of the Government to prosecute their Bill, he did not intend to proceed with his Bill. The Government never entertained any other intention than that of diligently prosecuting the Bill they had laid on the table; and, if it should be the pleasure of the House to read it a second time on the 23rd instant, he hoped it would be pressed through Committee, so as to go up to the House of Lords within the first seven days of July.

MEMORIAL FROM THE GUARDS—QUESTION.

MAJOR SIBTHORP said, he would beg to inquire of the hon. Under Secretary for the War Department whether any reply to the Memorial of the Guards had been drawn up at the War Office; and, if so, whether there would be any objection to lay it upon the table of the House?

MR. FREDERICK PEEL said, that a reply had been sent by the War Office, stating the grounds on which that department considered that the Memorial was without foundation. No further correspondence had taken place, and the position of the Guards remained as it had been before the Memorial was presented. Under those circumstances he did not see that any public advantage would be gained by laying the reply of the War Department on the table.

ST. PANCRAS WORKHOUSE—QUESTION.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he would beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Poor Law Board whether any progress had yet been made in the correction of the great evils which had arisen from the crowded state and defective accommodation of St. Pancras Workhouse; and, if not, whether he intended to take any steps to require and enforce the necessary improvements?

MR. BOUVERIE said, he would state for the information of the right hon. Gentleman and the House, what had taken place since the right hon. Gentleman had last asked the question. The report of Dr. Jones, on the subject of St. Pancras

Workhouse, was forwarded to the directors of the poor under the local Act for the Government of St. Pancras in the month of February. On the 29th of the same month the Poor Law Board received a letter from the directors acknowledging the receipt of the communication, and stating that certain measures for improvements were contemplated being put in operation for putting an end to the state of things to which the right hon. Baronet had referred. On the 4th of March the Poor Law Board wrote, expressing their satisfaction at hearing measures of improvement were contemplated, and hoping no time would be lost. A month after that letter was written he thought it right to instruct the inspector of the metropolitan district again to visit the workhouse, and report what progress had been made. On the 22nd of April the inspector's report was received, stating that no material improvement whatever had been effected upon the state of things reported on by Dr. Jones. The Poor Law Board then addressed a further letter to the directors of the poor, expressing regret at finding no improvement made, and intimating that, unless very material changes were effected in the condition of the workhouse, within two months the Poor Law Board would issue a peremptory order for reducing the number of persons in the workhouse. The two months would expire at the end of July. But he should, in justice to the directors of the poor, who, he believed, were really anxious to carry into effect material measures of improvement—in justice to them, he should read a letter from the senior churchwarden and chairman of the directors. It was as follows:—

"I beg to inform you that, although the present guardians have been in office only two months, vast improvements have been effected. The relieving-office has been enlarged and ventilated and adapted to a new system of out-door relief, to prevent crowding and waiting. Many improvements in the arrangement and management of the workhouse have also been effected, and the schools will be removed in a short time. It is only right that I should state—it would be unfair to the new directors not to do so—that they are doing all they can to alter the wretched state of affairs which they found on coming into power."

He believed the directors were anxious for improvement, although they had difficulties to encounter, not being absolute directors, but having to refer to and fro to their vestry; but he hoped with the creditable disposition of those Gentlemen, that material and effective changes would soon be made.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he hoped it would be known that, if improvements were not made within two months, the Government had the power to compel the directors to effect them.

MR. BOUVERIE said, they had certain power over the officers of the workhouses, but no direct power over the directors of the poor.

CLERKS OF NISI PRIUS IN DUBLIN— QUESTION.

MR. KENNEDY said, he would beg to ask the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland whether it was the intention of Her Majesty's Government to take any steps for providing an increase of salary for the clerks of Nisi Prius in Dublin, in consequence of the increased duties and expenses imposed on them—1, by the establishment of the Consolidated Nisi Prius Court in Dublin; and 2, by the Act called "The Common Law Procedure Act?"

MR. J. D. FITZGERALD said, in the first place he must inform the hon. and learned Gentleman that to make any alteration legislation would be necessary, and, having regard to the position of Irish business and the facilities given, he did not think it wise to add another to the string of Bills upon the paper for the present Session. The matter was under consideration with regard to these and other officers, with a view to place them on a permanent and more satisfactory footing.

STEAM COMMUNICATION WITH AUS- TRALIA—QUESTION.

MR. MACARTNEY said, he begged to ask the hon. Secretary to the Treasury what provision would be made for the conveyance of the Australian mails between England and Suez, in case parties tendered for carrying the mails to Sydney from Suez, via Point de Galle? Also, under what head of expenditure, in the Appropriation Acts of 1854 and 1855, will be the sums of £125,000 and £5,600, expended by the Board of Ordnance in purchasing lands at Aldershot and the adjoining parishes, for the purpose of forming a permanent camp there?

MR. WILSON said, that hon. Members were aware that at the present time a contract existed with the Peninsular and Oriental Company for the conveyance of mails to Suez. It would, therefore, be obviously inconsistent to propose a new contract for the same route, as in that case the payment for the carriage of mails as far as Suez would be made twice over. Any new company, therefore, must be willing to conform to such conditions as the Government may think proper, while the contract with the Peninsular and Oriental Company lasted. He could not answer the hon. Gentleman's second question then, but he would do so at a future time.

PUNISHMENT OF DEATH.

MR. W. EWART: * I could have wished, Sir, that this question had come forward at a time more favourable to calm consideration and deliberate debate, not at the conclusion of a trial of deep and absorbing interest. But the machinery of Parliament moves on undisturbed by external events. I feared that a brief delay might become an indefinite postponement of the question, and I hope that the present solemn occasion may even invite public attention to the serious subject which is now before us. That subject appears to me to be one of increased and increasing interest. Since I last addressed you concerning it, the public aversion to capital punishment has become deepened and extended. Our juries have become more reluctant to convict. Our Judges have become more reluctant to pass sentence. Of one species of murder it may be said that it has ceased to be capital. I mean infanticide by mothers. Yet whom should the laws more vigilantly protect than those who are themselves unprotected? Of one class of murderers it may be remarked, that they are beginning to escape capital punishment altogether. I mean women. Yet it has been truly observed, that "crime is of no sex." If you cease to execute women, can you long continue to execute men? Your executions only amounted to five in the last year of the criminal returns. It is not easy to conceive that the safety of society depends on the execution of five individuals. On the other hand, the repeal of capital punishment has extended itself in foreign countries. It has there been followed, not by danger, but by general benefit. Under these circumstances, I ask you again to consider the question, not to precipitate your conclusion by a sudden abrogation of the present law, but to investigate (before a Committee) the facts which we offer to lay before you: in a word—to pause and to inquire.

I am aware that there are those who entertain a preliminary objection to the consideration of this subject. Their objection is founded on religious (or what I should rather venture to call theological) grounds. For an objection so founded, I can only feel the highest respect. But it appears to me that the House of Commons never enters on the path of theology without deserting the more open and safer road of common sense. I think, moreover, that questions of a religious character should not be contaminated by exposure to the heated and feverish atmosphere of a political assembly. On such subjects let every man form his separate and sincere opinion. But in this House let him only express, not argue on, that opinion. For my own part I have been long convinced that the repeal of the punishment of death is in strict conformity with the precepts and the spirit of the Gospel; and I rejoice to think that such was the conviction of those early Christians, on whom the first dawn of Revelation still continued to shed its lingering light.

The question then resolves itself into one of a practical and purely deliberative character. Does the punishment of death contain the elements of a sound and valid punishment? What are the elements of such a punishment? This is the question now before us.

It appears to me that a punishment, to be a valid punishment, should, as far as possible, be an effective punishment; effective on the mind and soul of the criminal, and effective for the repression of the crime; that it should, as far as possible, be an equal punishment; not unduly weighing down and overwhelming one individual, while it produces little or no effect upon another; that it should especially be a certain punishment; I mean certain in its infliction, since certainty is the essence of punishment, as publicity has been said to be the soul of justice; and lastly (since all mankind are liable to err), that it should be a reversible, remediable, or revocable punishment. Does the punishment of death contain within itself these qualities? It appears to me that it is more than other punishments wanting in all of them.

Is it, in the first place, an effective punishment? The frequency of murders in our time does not seem to prove that it is so. It has often been stated, and never, that I am aware, contradicted, that out of a large number of executions, attested by a former Ordinary of Newgate, the great majority were undergone by those who had witnessed executions. But let us descend from general statements to individual facts. It is no agreeable task to undertake what may be called the morbid anatomy of crime. The mind naturally shrinks from such an undertaking. But it has been my duty to investigate such cases, and I now lay the following extracts from them before the House. Not many years since (in 1846) a criminal, Wicks, was executed at Newgate. He had lately seen an execution. He stated that he was "induced to commit the crime that he might signalise himself as a hero on the scaffold." In 1845 another criminal, Connor, committed murder. He had seen an execution on the very morning of the day on which he committed that murder. A criminal, Mobbs, was executed in 1853. Another criminal was brought before the police office, on the day of Mobbs' execution, for trying to imitate his crime, and (according to his own avowal) "to be executed for it." In 1854, Cumming (a man supposed by many to have been innocent) was executed at Edinburgh. After his execution, another man, Wallace, was taken into custody for perpetrating the same species of crime. A Scottish paper, The Scotsman, states that a number of similar crimes followed the execution of Cumming. But we witnessed, not long since, a remarkable case in Ireland, in which the criminals not only patiently endured, but gloried in, their punishment. Three men, it will be remembered, were executed at Monaghan, for the atrocious murder of Mr. Bateson. They were utterly indifferent to the punishment of death. They eat and smoked just before their execution. One of them stated that, if a reprieve came, he would not accept it. They said that the executioner was doing "the best deed that had ever been done for them." When one of them was asked on the scaffold whether he would say anything, he answered, "No! our Saviour said nothing when he was executed." It may be said that this was the effect of fanatical excitement, under the influence of the Catholic religion. But similar instances have occurred in the case of Protestants. In 1852, Elizabeth Pinckard was executed at Northampton:—

"On the fatal morning," (says the Northampton Mercury) "she attended prayers in the chapel; when the hymn was being sung her voice was heard above the rest. She went with perfect indifference to execution."

hibited the same indifference. Such appears to have been the case with Sarah Chesham, who committed fourteen murders by poisoning, and who never showed any symptoms of repentance or of fear. So likewise, lately, Bartélemi, an avowed unbeliever, died entirely unconcerned; he went to execution not only with indifference, but with a sort of fanatical curiosity. It would be easy to accumulate more instances; but I think that those I have adduced will tend at least to show that the punishment of death is not an effective punishment. Is it an equal punishment? I do not mean to argue that any punishment can be equal in its operation on all men, any more than I mean to argue that any punishment can be equally effective on all. But I say that there are other punishments more equal than this and more effective. Instances of stoical indifference we have already seen. Here are instances of a contrary effect. It is not long since a woman, Martha Browning was executed at Newgate; she fell down insensible; in that state she was executed. At Chester, a woman, Mary Gallop, could not go to her execution; she was carried to the scaffold in a chair, and executed in a state of insensibility. A very painful case of suffering was lately recorded in Jersey, by M. Victor Hugo; on which occasion he addressed a memorable letter to the Secretary of State for the Home Department. In 1851, Thomas Drory was executed at Chelmsford; he was obliged to be supported as he went to execution. We have fresh in our memory the recent case of Bousfield. We remember the prostration of the prisoner; the faltering of the executioner; the miserable struggle between them at the last; and the indignation and execrations of the public. I come now to a very important, perhaps the most important, element in the constitution of a punishment. I mean its certainty of infliction. It is well known that Beccaria, at the opening of one of the chapters of his celebrated work, lays it down as a doctrine that "one of the greatest of all checks on crime consists not in the cruelty, but in the certainty, of its punishment." If the doctrine be true as to crimes in general, it appears to me to be much more applicable to the graver class of crimes, and most applicable to the gravest of all crimes, murder. But, if I may trust to the records of our punishments for a series of years, punishment is much less certain in this single case which remains capital, than in those which are no longer so.

Statistics, however, are the constant subject of dispute; they are the debateable land, the border-ground of controversy. I prefer to appeal to facts. I will first exhibit the operation of the maintenance of capital punishment on our juries; secondly, its operation on our Judges; lastly, on what may be called our tribunal of ultimate appeal, the Home Department. First, with respect to the uncertainty of the verdicts of our juries. In 1847, a woman (already referred to), Sarah Chesham, was tried at Chelmsford for poisoning. The case, a most atrocious one, was clearly proved; but the jury, led by their foreman, an enemy to capital punishment, acquitted the prisoner. The acquittal enabled her to resume her career of poisoning; she practised it with augmented skill, acquired from the evidence of a medical witness at the trial. The victims were her own children. In 1848 she was again tried, and again acquitted. In 1851 she was executed for poisoning her husband. Now, had there been another punishment (such as imprisonment for life) attached to the crime of murder, there is no doubt that she would have been found guilty on the first indictment. All her subsequent crimes would have been checked. All her subsequent victims would have been saved; nor would her example have misled others. For, in 1849, a woman, named May, was also executed at Chelmsford for poisoning; she attributed to the example of the first-named criminal, the crime for which she suffered. Two criminals, Battersby and Wilkinson, were tried in 1851 at York. The proof of murder was, to all common apprehension, clear. The Judge told the jury that it was difficult to believe that the death was caused by manslaughter. Yet the jury returned a verdict of manslaughter. In January, 1852, Thomas Bare was proved, by the strongest evidence, to have murdered his own wife. He even acknowledged that he deserved to be executed. Yet he was acquitted by the jury. The Times of that date thus concludes a leading article: "If there be such a crime as murder, this is murder; and murder of no common atrocity." It adds that (in cases involving capital punishment) "the Judge, Jury, Home Secretary, and public, contend to mitigate the crime of murder." In the case of the Matfen murder, tried on the 27th March last, at Durham, the guilt of one prisoner appeared certain. A jurymen, however, told a person, who can be produced, that they all "agreed on a verdict of acquittal rather than the man should hang." In the case of Westron, tried at the Central Criminal Court, in February, 1856, the jury said—

"We find the prisoner guilty of Wilful Murder. We do not think he ought to be acquitted on the ground of insanity; but we recommend him to mercy, because we find there was a predisposition to insanity."

The law of the country could justify no such recommendation. The Times newspaper, of February 8, 1856, calls the verdict "an anomaly in criminal proceedings, and one of most evil precedent." Last year (1855), at Maidstone, during the spring assizes, Elizabeth Avis Lawes was tried for murder. Her guilt was clear. She afterwards confessed it. Yet she was acquitted. The South Eastern Gazette, of that date, says this is "a memorable example of the impunity awarded to murderers." I can produce (if I am allowed to bring evidence before a Committee) instances of jurors having stated that they would have found prisoners guilty, as they were bound to do; but when they learnt from the Judge that the penalty would be death, they resolved on an acquittal. So far for the effect on our juries.

But let us turn to the feelings and opinions of our Judges. Do they not indicate a change with regard to this question, corresponding with the change observable in public feeling and opinion? And first, as to the feelings of our Judges on pronouncing sentence of death. Among other instances, I find the following facts recorded in the journals of the day. At a late trial for murder at Bodmin—

"The learned Judge, on pronouncing sentence, expressed himself with much emotion: in the last sentence his utterance was almost choked; after completing it, his Lordship burst into tears, and continued weeping for some time."

So, in the case of a trial at Aylesbury—

"During the delivery of the sentence, his Lordship appeared almost choked with emotion."

Again, in a case tried at Exeter—

"The Judge at last came to the sentence; but his sobs, which could be heard all over the court, prevented him from proceeding. He rested his head on his hand, and wept most bitterly. He then, in broken words, and with a voice almost stifled by emotion, pronounced the sentence."

I mention these facts (to which it would be easy for me to add more) as highly honourable to our Judges. But they indicate a state of feeling with respect to capital punishment which did not exist in former times. How different from those times in which Pope could say—

“Hard words and hanging if your Judge be Page.”

Can the expression of such feelings by the Judges fail to produce sympathetic feelings on the part of juries and of the public? What effect has it on the mind of the prisoner, and on the minds of criminals in general? Does it not, so far as it extends, add to the uncertainty of the execution of the law by showing the disinclination of our Judges to inflict the punishment of death?

Such, then, are the feelings of the Judges. But what are their recorded opinions? Nine years ago (in the year 1847), a Committee of the House of Lords investigated the subject of criminal punishment. The written opinions of the Judges were taken in evidence. Among the questions proposed to them was this: “Do you think any punishment would be a sufficient substitute for death?” Out of all the Judges of England, Scotland, and Ireland, four delivered their opinions in favour of substituting another punishment. Several declined to give an opinion, or declared themselves doubtful. First, let us take the Lord Chief Justice (Denman). He declines to give an opinion. Next, Mr. Justice Wightman. His answer is as follows:—

“There can be little doubt that a secondary punishment may be made so severe as to be a sufficient substitute for the punishment of death.”

Mr. Justice Maule: he gives no answer. Mr. Justice Coltman: he answers:—

“I am disposed to think that imprisonment for life, without any remission of the sentence, might be substituted for capital punishment. Many guilty persons now escape who would then be convicted. I do not think the apprehension of death operates much on the mind of a man meditating a great crime.”

The answer of Lord Chief Justice Wilde is as follows:—

“The question involves considerations much too grave to warrant a hasty opinion, however great may be the objections to the punishment of death; and, in my opinion, they are very great.”

From the Irish Bench, Mr. Justice Perrin thus answers the question, “Do you think any punishment, by transportation or imprisonment, would be a sufficient substitute for death?”

“I do. I am convinced that juries acquit or disagree from an apprehension of taking away life.”

Chief Baron Richards also answers:—

“I am inclined to think that transportation attended with stringent regulations might be substituted for the punishment of death. But I cannot say that I have formed a very decided opinion.”

Now, if nine years ago many of the Judges were doubtful as to the expediency of inflicting the punishment of death, or opposed to it, is it likely that they would be less doubtful or less unfavourable now? Is it not rather more probable that the Judges who have been since appointed, and the Judges who are being appointed from time to time may be still more disinclined to such a punishment; just as the Judges of the year 1847 were more disinclined to it than the Judges of the year 1827? Here, again, is another and an increasing element of uncertainty. Let us now turn to the final tribunal of appeal, the Home Office. Are there no elements of uncertainty here? Do not Members know that if a sentence of death is impending in any of the towns they represent they are frequently called on to interpose? Do not deputations hurry up to London? Are there not those who, resident in London, on almost every occasion, exert themselves to intercept the execution of the law? The hon. Member for East Surrey (Mr. Drummond) has signified his intention of endeavouring to relieve the Home Secretary from this assiduity of intervention. But, with great respect for the hon. Gentleman, I think he is undertaking nothing less than the task of the Danaids. For my own part, I feel bound to testify, on behalf of those who make these applications, their sense of the ready attention of the right hon. Secretary to every fact which may tend to mitigate the sentence. Nevertheless, the public do not understand on what principle some criminals are executed, after appeal to the Home Office, while others, apparently of equal guilt, escape. We all remember, a few years ago, the case of Annette Meyer. There appeared to be, in her case, full premeditation of the murder. Yet she escaped the punishment of death. Not long since, the case of Corrigan, whose sentence was remitted, called forth the animadversions of the press and of the public. Still more, the recent case of Celestina Somner. She coolly and cruelly premeditated and prepared for the murder of her child. Few instances of more unrelenting cruelty have been recorded. Yet she, too, escaped. After this and similar cases, I doubt very much whether you can long continue to execute women. You may try to bring us back to the ancient rigour of the law. It will be in vain. The evil lies not in the administration of the law, but to the nature of the punishment awarded by the law. Here, in my opinion, is the source and origin of the evil. The power of the executive at the Home Office is enfeebled by the awful responsibility involved in the punishment. This is in itself an element of uncertainty. But there are others. Different Secretaries may be of different minds. The present Secretary may be of a lenient, his successor may be of a severer character. A crime which would escape the punishment of death under the one would incur such punishment under the other. Again, the Secretaries of State generally refer the case back for reconsideration to the Judge who tried it. Judges differ in their characters as Secretaries do. A sentence which one Judge might mitigate, another Judge might be determined to maintain. Here, again, arises another cause to be added to the various causes I have already cited of the uncertainty of capital punishment.

I have said that an essential ingredient in the character of a punishment should be its reversibility; its revocable or remedial nature. It is not likely that, in these times, the execution of an innocent person can occur. Nevertheless, though not likely, it is not impossible. For felonies inferior to murder, but of an aggravated character, it is easy to cite instances of innocent persons having been punished. They have been brought back from transportation, and their sentences have been revoked. I have myself brought such cases under the consideration of this House. The case of Eliza Fenning, executed many years ago for the alleged crime of attempting to poison the family of her master, a crime of which she was afterwards shown to be innocent, is familiar to most of us. But, more recently, in the case of Mr. Bateson's murder, two men, the Kellys, were twice or three times put upon their trial for life for that murder, under the sanction of the most eminent of the Solicitors and Attorneys General for Ireland. The two Kellys were seen to run across a field after the shot was fired; they were entirely innocent, yet they might have been convicted—and of one of them, it is stated in an Irish paper, that he has since died of a broken heart.

in consequence of the prosecution. Three other men were afterwards proved to have committed the murder. A very short time ago a man named Cummings was executed at Edinburgh. He is now generally believed to have been innocent. Such are the dangers which attend an irremediable punishment.

These, then, as I have classed them, are the principal impediments to the execution of capital punishment. The question naturally suggests itself—whence in all their stages arise these impediments to the law? How comes there to be this consentaneous restriction by juries, by Judges, by the Home Office, and the public, to the infliction of the sentence of the law? I believe that these impediments arise from two causes. No punishment has been found to be an approved or lasting punishment which contains in it the principle of retaliatory revenge. We know that in the time of Queen Elizabeth the punishment of branding was adopted—it could not be maintained. In the same way the punishment of the pillory and other ignominious punishments have speedily or gradually vanished. In more remote times we find the principle of retaliatory vengeance carried to its greatest excess. Yet in those times, crimes abounded. Capital punishment is nearly the last trace which we retain of the principle of retaliatory revenge; and the more we advance in civilisation, the more deep our religious feelings become, the greater will be our repugnance to the punishment of death. Another, and an unconquerable objection, arises from the irremediable nature of the punishment. Never, while human nature exists, never will you induce mankind to view a punishment which cannot be remitted or recalled in the same light in which they view a remissible or revocable punishment. This objection, too, will infallibly increase as society advances.

Such appears to me to be the real causes of the non-execution of the law.

But what remedies have been proposed? A distinguished and right rev. Prelate (the Bishop of Oxford) has lately suggested the consideration of a new mode of conducting executions. They are no longer to be witnessed by the public, but by a sort of deputation on behalf of the public. This system would, no doubt, exclude the evils arising from a vast congregation of the people, their vindictiveness, or their indifference, their profaneness, their revelry, and their crimes. Nor can it be doubted that these evils are aggravated by the facilities of intercourse in modern times. Even now, I am told, special trains are announced in the newspapers as about to run to and from Stafford to enable the public to witness the last moments of an expected victim. All these, the mere external evils of publicity, will be removed by the change proposed. But publicity, in modern times, does not consist so much in seeing, as in reading an account of what occurs. A few thousands witness an execution, many millions read of it. You may exclude the public, but you cannot exclude the press. The interest taken in an execution will continue to exist. It will even be aggravated and stimulated by concealment. Public curiosity will rush the more eagerly per vetitum nefas. The most minute details will have to be recorded; more minute, if possible, than those which are recorded now. By adopting this change you will have only veiled, not removed, the evil. Another system proposed is very nearly the one prevailing now; that of occasional executions. In the first place, this system abandons the principle of a fixed punishment for murder. It substitutes a possibility of execution for a certainty of execution. It encourages a species of gambling in crime. When you have arrived at occasional punishment, you have abandoned one fixed punishment, and you have not arrived at another fixed punishment. This is a most vague and fluctuating, and consequently a most impolitic and unjust, state of the criminal law. Now, what remedy do we venture to propose?

We suggest the substitution of a lesser punishment attended with comparative certainty of execution, for a severer punishment attended with uncertainty. And we rest our cause on those words of the illustrious Beccaria:

“The certainty of a more moderate punishment will always produce a greater impression than the fear of a more terrible punishment, accompanied with the hope of impunity.”

This is our principle. We, not you, are the real friends of effective punishment for crime. You call us false philosophers, theorists, and speculative reformers: while we in fact pursue a clear, practical, and decided course. It is you who, by lingering in a system no longer maintainable, enfeeble the arm of justice and promote impunity for crime.

We have not proved theorists as to the other numerous cases (of forgery, of housebreaking, of stealing in dwelling-houses, of cattle-stealing) for which we have induced you tardily and unwillingly to abolish the punishment of death. In not one of those cases can an advocate be found for the restoration of capital punishment. But we also appeal to the example of foreign countries. If foreign nations can successfully abolish capital punishment, why should not we? The case of Tuscany, under Leopold II., has often been referred to. The successful repeal of the punishment of death in Tuscany (dated November 30, 1786) has never, that I am aware, been denied. And, though in the first excesses of the French Revolution capital punishment was revived, it appears since that time to have been gradually dying out in Tuscany. In 1838 the unanimous consent of the Judges was required for its infliction. This enactment amounted almost to abolition. In 1847, the Grand Duke abolished it in the Duchy of Lucca, and in 1849 he sanctioned the Decree of the Provisional Government which had suppressed capital punishment in Tuscany. It appears from the writings of the Rev. Mr. Townshend, that in Bavaria, reformatory discipline and imprisonment are successfully substituted for the punishment of death. In Switzerland, capital punishment has been abolished in the cantons of Freiburg and Neuchâtel. In Freiburg, the abolition took place eight years ago. My informant, a member of the Legislation of Neuchâtel, assures me that crime has not increased there; while, in the canton of Berne, where executions are frequent, great crimes are frequent also. In Neuchâtel, the repeal of capital punishment is more recent. So far, I understand, it has given general satisfaction. Let us now turn to America. From a speech of Mr. Andrews, delivered before a Committee of the Legislature of Massachusetts, March 22, 1855, I learn that, “Alabama abolished capital punishment many years ago.” He adds “the experiment may be considered to work well in Alabama.” The State of Michigan led the way in the career of total abolition. The Secretary of State (as quoted by Mr. Andrews) says, in 1846,

“It has produced a greater certainty of conviction, consequently of relief to the community, lessening the number of aggravated offences. There is no probability of a return to the old law.”

This is the result of an experiment of nine years in Michigan. Of Rhode Island (where capital punishment appears to have such rapid strides it was now impossible to detect the presence of poison. Was that a reason for giving increased facilities to poisoners? The hon. Gentleman the Member for Sheffield (Mr. Hadfield) had told them that Judges sometimes wept while pronouncing sentence of death, and both that hon. Gentleman and the hon. Member for Dumfries called on the House not to subject Judges to so disagreeable a task. However, both those hon. Members had been supporters of the late war. Where were their horrors at the duty which the generals engaged in that war had to carry out? Were they desirous of putting an end to war? Did they think that their generals and colonels had no feeling when giving orders that doomed men to destruction? Pictures more horrible than anything that could be drawn at public executions might be painted of scenes in every way. He had thought it right, in answer to the Motion of the hon. Member for Dumfries, to put on the paper a notice of his intention to suggest that some means should be taken to relieve the Secretary of State from the importunities to which he was subjected from persons who sought to get reprieves for criminals sentenced to capital punishment. He (Mr. Drummond) had been acquainted with the late Sir Fowell Buxton, and he had never met him but he found he was engaged in some scheme to get off some scoundrel under sentence of death. On the first occasion of his meeting his late Friend, he was on an expedition of that sort to the then Secretary of State for the Home Department, Sir Robert Peel. He (Mr. Drummond) asked him was there any doubt of the prisoner's guilt? His friend replied there was not. He (Mr. Drummond) then asked him why he interfered? The hon. Gentleman replied that he felt it his duty to interfere. The next time he met him he was visiting the prisons of Rome, and he went to the Pope to beg some of the prisoners off. Now, he had no doubt that the Pope told him to mind his own affairs. The last time he met his friend, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Walpole) was Secretary of State for the Home Department, and the gentleman in question was, with others, about to wait on him on behalf of a criminal who had committed an atrocious murder at Bath. In that case the Judge had expressed his approval of the verdict of the jury; and he (Mr. Drummond) refused to accompany his friend and others to the Secretary of State, for which refusal his right hon. Friend (Mr. Walpole) thanked him for not countenancing the deputation. The House might judge of the importunities to which a Gentleman in the position at present occupied by his right hon. Friend (Sir G. Grey) was subjected. There was at present a petition, to which signatures were being obtained, and which was to be presented to his right hon. Friend. In that petition the fellows who signed it stated that they were not satisfied with a certain trial. How could they be? They had not been the jurors; they had not been the Judges—how could they know anything about the matter? Then came Mr. Herapath. He (Mr. Drummond) would not say what Mr. Herapath's opinion was about, for it was not worth much, unless he (Mr. Drummond) was greatly misinformed. A right hon. Gentleman was present who could contradict him if he was wrong in stating that on a particular occasion, when the right hon. Gentleman was Secretary of State, Mr. Herapath importuned him to stay an execution, because he was sure that a certain drug had not been used. Well, it turned out that at the very moment when Mr. Herapath was so importuning the Secretary of State, the criminal was confessing to having committed the crime. Was it not heartrending that the Secretary of State should be put in such a position and subjected to such a pressure? Originally a person tried in the country was left in the custody of the sheriffs, with a mark opposite his name if he were to be executed, and the sheriffs saw that the sentence was carried into effect. In London the sentence was reported to the Recorder, who reported it to the Sovereign. However, that system had since been altered. Now, what he (Mr. Drummond) proposed was, that when a respite was sought for, reference should be made to a Commission to which the Crown could refer cases in which reconsideration might be deemed necessary. That body might comprise the President of the Council, the Judge who tried the case, the Lord Chief Justices of the Queen's Bench and the Common Pleas, and the Law Chancellor; and, if it should appear to them that fresh evidence had been discovered, then they could advise the Crown to interpose. He (Mr. Drummond) did not seek to interfere with the prerogative of the Crown. The Sovereign might send the whole regiment of Horse Guards his own country at least thirty persons brought up to receive a sentence of death that was never intended to be carried out. Subsequently the ceremony of sentencing to death in such cases as those to which he alluded was dispensed with, and the sentence merely recorded in the books of the Court. There had been no execution in the country, except for wilful murder, saving in one case, since 1841. That exceptional case had been alluded to by his hon. Friend. He (Mr. Hadfield) rejoiced that he was not the man with whom the responsibility of Palmer's death rested. At the same time he admitted that the power to reprieve could not be placed in better hands than those of the right hon. Baronet who at present filled the office of Secretary of State for the Home Department. To assent to the Motion of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. Ewart) would be to follow the course which was commenced by those great men, Sir Samuel Romilly, Sir James Macintosh, and Sir Robert Peel, with whom he would now associate the hon. Member for Dumfries. The passing of sentence of death frequently gave rise to the most painful scenes in court. There were instances of mere children having been tried and convicted to capital punishment. In one of those cases Mr. Justice Talfourd covered his face with his hands and sank back upon his seat with grief. It was desirable the Committee should be granted to ascertain whether the punishment of death had been instrumental in procuring that which its advocates supposed to be accomplished by this severe punishment, or whether it had not a contrary effect, and a tendency to brutalise society at large. He therefore trusted the House would grant the Committee.

MR. DRUMMOND said, he would venture to occupy the time of the House for a few minutes—not certainly with the presumptuous idea of interfering to convert public opinion, because he had not the presumption to imagine that, in the year 1856, for the first time since the creation of the world, men were about to learn how they should punish for crime. Men having, through all ages and at all times continued the punishment of death, it appeared to him to be monstrous presumption to pass so sweeping a censure upon all that had been done in former times. The hon. Mover had stated that as it was impossible to prevent the course of justice being occasionally impeded and the judgments of tribunals defeated, therefore capital punishment should be abolished. A Select Committee was asked for to inquire into the operation of the law imposing the punishment of death. Why, what could be the operation of that law, if carried out, but simply death? That would be its operation if it were allowed to operate, but if persons chose to intervene then it would not act at all. The hon. Gentleman had objected to the introduction of religion upon this matter, but nevertheless had the hardihood to declare that the punishment of death was contrary to the spirit and practice of the Gospel. But surely there could not be a sentence expressed in plainer words than that which said, "Whoso sheddeth man's blood by man shall his blood be shed." It was absurd to hold forth the Bible as the religion of Protestants if they were to set aside plain words which could not be controverted, and upon which their law should be founded. It was argued, however, that the words applied to a Jewish people and not to Christians; but he (Mr. Drummond) had heard of a bishop, somewhat famous in Christian history, who, when a man told him a lie, immediately struck him dead, and so far from repenting of the act soon after administered the same punishment to that man's wife for a similar offence. What would Exeter Hall say if a bishop were now to strike a man dead for a lie? The hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. Ewart) said that the evil of punishment of death was its uncertainty. Why, what could be so certain? The hon. Gentleman meant, perhaps, it was not with certainty carried into effect. Was that what he meant? And he proposed to substitute for this punishment of death perpetual imprisonment. Had the hon. Gentleman any argument to show that that punishment of perpetual imprisonment would be with certainty carried into effect? The same argument on the ground of uncertainty would apply against any other species of punishment as well as against that of capital punishment. The hon. Gentleman had appealed to the opinion of jurors. The hon. Gentleman and those who acted with him had told juries to prepare themselves. That was the effect of their glorious teaching; that was the effect of their poisoning the public mind. The hon. Gentleman promised them increased civilisation and increased intelligence if they put an end to punishment by death. He said that the science of poison had made opinion that it is contrary to the Gospel to inflict capital punishment for any crime. The hon. Member has two alternatives—either to admit the theological grounds, and encounter those who object, on alleged scriptural grounds, even to consider the question of abolishing capital punishment for murder, or to reject the theological grounds, and give up the support of those who petition for its abolition as objectionable and unlawful, because in their view it is opposed to the spirit of the Gospel. One other preliminary observation as to these petitions—a good many have been presented for the total abolition of the punishment of death, and none have been presented against such abolition. Now, I will admit that if it were a case of an ordinary kind, a strong inference might be drawn that public opinion ran strongly in one direction, and that it was the general desire of the country that capital punishment should be abolished. That inference cannot, however, be legitimately drawn in this instance. There are numbers of persons who, actuated no doubt by feelings of humanity, devote their time and their best exertions to procure the abolition of the punishment of death. They get up petitions upon the subject. Many of the petitions bear so great a similarity to one another that, in fact, they are almost stereotyped in the same terms. They express, no doubt, the opinions of those who sign them. But a feeling of humanity in men's minds deters them from asking that capital punishment shall be enforced, and thus it is that in particular cases importunity is always one-sided. As long as a man is suspected of being guilty of an atrocious murder the feeling of the people is against the criminal and with the law. They are anxious that no means shall be omitted which can insure the conviction of the prisoner, if he be guilty of the crime of which he is charged. But the moment he is convicted and sentenced to punishment, be it death or transportation, a certain number immediately sympathise with the criminal, look upon him as an object of pity, and exert themselves to obtain a commutation or remission of his sentence; while, on the other hand, no one petitions that the person on whom sentence is passed shall not be recommended to mercy. Public feeling is not expressed accurately. The opinion against remission is, in many cases, strongly but silently entertained. Do not let us, therefore, suppose that the real feeling of the people is expressed by petitions on this subject. One other preliminary observation. When the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Hadfield) enumerated the names of great men who assisted benevolent persons like the hon. Member for Dumfries in their exertions to mitigate the severity of the criminal law, he mentioned those of Sir Samuel Romilly and Sir Robert Peel; but history and Parliamentary records prove that, although they were favourable to removing capital punishment from a great many crimes, the hon. Gentleman is in error in supposing they were among those who ask that in the case of a person guilty of the atrocious crime of murder he shall not suffer death as the punishment of that offence. My hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries placed this question on the ground of expediency, and asked, is it desirable to retain the punishment of death for murder? He has defined what he conceives punishment ought always to comprise. He said, first, that it should be effective for the repression of crime; secondly, that it should be equal; thirdly, that it should be certain; and, fourthly, that it should be revocable. Following those points, relying chiefly on the first—namely, the efficiency of the punishment, I must express my opinion—an opinion which I strongly entertain, which is confirmed more and more by reference to statistical records, and which rests on the inward conviction of every man's mind, that is not capable of being refuted—that the punishment of death is looked to with greater dread than any other punishment, and is more effectual than any other in repressing crime. I observe that, at the meeting held in the City yesterday, from which a petition has to-night been presented, it was stated as evidence of its inefficiency, that whereas all those crimes with regard to which the punishment of death was repealed had diminished, the crime of murder, for which it was retained, had increased. Now without going into statistics, I may state at once that the contrary is the fact. My hon. Friend must give me leave to state to him, that he is mistaken in supposing that his statistics warrant the conclusion that the abolition of capital punishment has caused a diminution in the number of those offences to which the penalty of death was at one time attached. Not only is that not true, but the very reverse is the fact. Robberies, burglaries, and other felonies of the secondary class have increased in number, and progressively so, since the punishment of death has been abrogated. The crime of murder, on the contrary, has remained about stationary, but stationary, be it remembered, in relation to a population which is rapidly increasing. The number of persons, committed not convicted, on charges of murder in the year 1845, was sixty-five; in 1854 it was sixty-two. The difference is scarcely appreciable, yet the population had increased in the interim by nearly 2,000,000. Some of the intermediate years show a trifling excess, but it is so very small as scarcely to admit of its being taken into calculation, and upon the whole we are justified in estimating that the crime of murder is rather upon the decrease than the increase. This shows that, let theorists say what they will, the fear of an ignominious death as the punishment of murder does deter some persons from the perpetration of that awful crime. Nor let it be supposed that there is any intention to exempt women from that punishment. During the last ten years fourteen women have been executed for murder, and of these I grieve to say that ten forfeited their lives during the period that I have held the office of Home Secretary. In the year 1849 no fewer than five women were brought to the scaffold. This being the state of the case, I hope that no erroneous opinion will get abroad that women may commit murder with impunity. The next point on which my hon. Friend insisted was, that punishment should be equal, and in this respect he deems the penalty of death defective. He told us that some criminals go to the scaffold without appearing to feel their dreadful position—that they are obdurate, hardened, impenitent, and were anxious to be regarded as heroes; whereas others are so overcome with shame and terror that at last they lose motion and consciousness, and have almost to be dragged to the gallows. But can my hon. Friend suggest any punishment, whether transportation, imprisonment, or penal servitude, which will not be liable to this objection of inequality? If you sentence to transportation a man surrounded by all the luxuries of life, having a wife, children, and friends, to all of whom he is tenderly attached, the punishment will certainly fall upon him with crushing severity; but it will not have the same effect on a man in humble life, who, unmarried and childless, has no friends and relations for whom he cares. This objection of inequality, therefore, is one which applies with equal cogency to all kinds of punishment as well as that of death; therefore, the idea of an absolute equality of punishment is altogether Utopian. But then my hon. Friend urges the argument of "certainty," and contends that the particular punishment annexed to an offence ought in every case to be inflicted. Now, Sir, that is a doctrine which would be found very difficult of application. The law of itself affords a very liberal discretion to Judges as to the period of imprisonment or penal servitude that may be awarded for a stated offence. That which is in the eye of the law the very same crime may be visited with punishment of very different degrees according to the varying circumstances of each particular case. And so with regard to murder; it is impossible to overlook the vast difference in the degrees of guilt that two cases may present. We may imagine a case of the most deliberate and cold-blooded assassination, and we may picture to ourselves another case where, though the jury found the prisoner guilty of murder, his offence was, in point of fact, scarcely distinguishable from manslaughter. If by "certainty," then, you mean that, without reference to the distinctive circumstances, the same punishment shall in each case be inflicted, you will lay down a rule which will be productive of great injustice. It is no uncommon occurrence that, even after the trial has terminated, circumstances not known at the time come unexpectedly to light, which justify an exercise of the Royal clemency on behalf of the condemned person. If this be an evil, will it be remedied by substituting imprisonment or transportation for capital punishment? Assuredly not, for the Royal prerogative will remain untouched. My hon. Friend advocates the infliction of such a punishment as imprisonment for life in the case of murder, making it irrevocable and irremediable, and yet—strange inconsistency!—he objects to capital punishment for the very same reason. The theory is, that a sentence of imprisonment has this advantage over one of capital punishment, that it may be revoked in the event of its being discovered that the verdict was unjust; yet my hon. Friend, from the tenor of his arguments, would destroy that theory and doom to imprisonment without hope of emancipation. With regard to juries it appears to me that my hon. Friend has very much over-stated his case. He would have us believe that one of the consequences of annexing capital punishment to the crime of murder is that juries frequently refuse to convict, even on the clearest evidence. There may have been a few such cases—though for my own part I know of none—but I am sure that it is true as a general rule that, where the evidence is clear and conclusive, and when it has been laid before the jury with that lucidity, happily so characteristic of the charges of English Judges, juries return a conscientious verdict, and do not disregard the solemn obligation of their oath through a disinclination to pronounce a verdict the consequence of which may be death to the prisoner. No doubt the knowledge that such may be the result of the verdict may make juries and even Judges more willing to present a case to their own mind in the point of view most favourable to the accused, so that they may avoid a mistake that can never be remedied. There have been many cases in which the line between murder and manslaughter—being a very nice one—a verdict of manslaughter, although the evidence might have justified a verdict of murder, has been returned; but it cannot be said that the ends of justice have been defeated by such a result. In that event, the punishment inflicted is what my hon. Friend would award in every instance—that of penal servitude, or transportation, and generally for life. The emotion manifested by Judges in sentencing prisoners to death has really nothing to do with the question. It must be distressing to a Judge to doom a fellow-creature to an ignominious death on the scaffold; but my hon. Friend has failed to mention any occasion on which a Judge has shrunk from the performance of that duty, however painful it may be. With respect to the office of Home Secretary, which I have the honour to hold, I admit with the hon. Member for West Surrey (Mr. Drummond) that there can be no duty more painful than that of receiving the importunate applications made for mercy between the time of passing sentence and that of carrying it into effect; and assuredly there is no duty which requires to be more firmly performed than that which involves the careful examination of the grounds on which such applications are urged. In cases of this nature the Home Secretary, assisted by that legal advice which is always available, puts himself in communication with the Judge who presided at the trial. In the great majority of cases there are no difficulties. If the evidence at the trial was incontrovertible, and if the application does not rest upon matters which have subsequently come to light, but simply upon the general objections which certain well-meaning persons entertain towards capital punishment in any form and under any circumstances, the course to be taken by the Home Secretary is clear and does not admit of doubt. Other cases there are, in which the Judge represents to the Government that there are circumstances which render it advisable that the extreme penalty should not be inflicted, and in such cases the Secretary of State is in a great measure relieved from responsibility. But no doubt the duty and responsibility of the Secretary of State have been much increased by a humane alteration of the law made in the last year of the reign of William IV., when a Bill was passed repealing the law by which it was provided that in cases of murder the sentence should be carried into effect on the next day but one after conviction. At that time there were not the same facilities of locomotion as at present, and in many instances the law precluded the possibility of an appeal to the Home Office; the sentence having been carried into effect before it could be known to the Secretary of State to have been passed. There is now a considerable interval between the sentence and execution, during which strong representations and statements of facts, or alleged facts, are sometimes laid before the Secretary of State, even within a few days of the execution, and which, if true, may have an important bearing on the guilt or innocence of the prisoner. Such memorials are referred to the Judge who presided at the trial, with a request that he will send his report on the subject. An instance of this occurred within my own official experience. Great difficulty presented itself in dealing with the statements founded upon affidavit made to the Home Office, and the convict was respited for a week, an intimation being given at the same time to the prison authorities, to be communicated to the convict, that this step did not justify any expectation that the sentence would be remitted, but was only intended to enable the truth of the representations made in favour of the convict to be properly investigated. In some cases of that kind it has turned out that the affidavits were good for nothing, their allegations breaking down as soon as they came to be investigated before the magistrates on the spot, and the sentence was therefore executed. In some instances, however, statements of the previous history of the criminal, of the peculiar circumstances under which the crime was committed, and other considerations which cannot be very easily explained, have been brought under the attention of the Government, and received that weight to which they were entitled. Some deference must also be paid to public opinion, which cannot be wholly disregarded without enlisting the sympathy of the people on behalf of the criminal and against the law; and the rule, therefore, to be observed is so to administer the law that public opinion shall go along with its enforcement, and that where a prisoner has suffered the extreme penalty it may be generally felt that nothing that told in his favour was overlooked, and that his execution was fully justified. At the same time, if the hon. Member for West Surrey can suggest a mode by which the responsibility of the Secretary of State shall be lessened, he will confer a very great boon on the occupant of an onerous office. Yet I know not how that responsibility can be transferred to other hands, and therefore, while I hold my present situation, I can only say that I shall continue to exercise the power intrusted to me impartially, firmly, and to the best of my ability, with an earnest desire to render the law efficacious for the repression of crime. My hon. Friend (Mr. W. Ewart) says that as the science of chemistry advances the difficulty of detecting murder by poisoning will increase. That is a most dangerous doctrine; but, happily, it has no solid foundation. The crime of poisoning by arsenic used to be very common, but it has been checked, because the progress of chemical research enables it to be discovered with certainty. Such, I believe, will be the case with other poisons, and I maintain that the chances of detection are infinitely augmented, not diminished, by the improvements of science. I need not touch on public executions, since they do not enter into the question whether or not the punishment of death ought to be retained. The objection that executions are vindictive, retaliatory, and revengeful, if it has any force, applies equally to every other mode of punishment. How is there more of a retaliatory spirit evinced in putting to death a man who has taken away the life of a fellow-creature than in immuring him in a prison for life? My hon. Friend himself says the latter is the severer punishment of the two. If that be so, according to his own argument his substitute for the punishment of death must be more revengeful. My hon. Friend has, in my opinion, adduced nothing from the example of other countries that should prevail upon us to depart from our established law. I believe that death is the punishment which men most dread, and that it is the right and the bounden duty of the State to inflict it for wilful and deliberate murder. On these grounds I hope the House will not accede to this Motion.

MR. LIDDELL said, that the hon. Member for Dumfries had urged as a strong reason, in favour of his Motion for a Committee, the difficulty of bringing public opinion to bear upon the question—that was to say, unanimously; but where was the country in which free discussion existed to such an extent, and where could public opinion be brought to bear upon any question by means of an unshackled press, more powerfully than here? The hon. Member seemed to have confounded public opinion with private judgment, and not to have allowed the weight to which they were entitled to the opinions of our lawgivers, and to the customs and usages of the country in reference to this question. Now, Judge Blackstone, a great authority upon this subject, said, that when the question arose whether death might be lawfully inflicted, the wisdom of the law had to decide it, and that to this public judgment or decision all private judgment must submit, or else there was an end to the first principles of all society and government. The onus probandi rested on the assailants of the existing law, who were bound to show that some other mode of punishment than death would operate as a greater preventive of murder. Those who were in favour of the abolition of capital punishment did so upon the ground that statistics proved that it did not act as a preventive of crime. But the House should consider, in regard to these statistics, how many things acted upon the sources and causes of crime. The circumstances of a county, its state in any particular year, the want of occupation for its inhabitants—all these things tended materially to affect the calendar of crime. Consequently, such statistics were not very safe or reliable guides for legislation upon the subject. After some further observations, which the continuous calls for a division rendered altogether inaudible, the hon. Gentleman concluded by stating that he should vote against the Motion.

MR. BROTHERTON said, he could not allow the debate to close without offering his tribute of thanks to his hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries for bringing this subject again under the consideration of the House. The question was a most important one, and although it might not be popular in that House, he had no hesitation in avowing it as his conscientious opinion that capital punishments were contrary alike to the law of God, the spirit of the Christian religion, and to sound policy. The object of punishment must be either to reform the criminal, make reparation to society for the injury done, or to deter others from the commission of crime, by the example afforded. It could easily be shown that capital punishment did not produce any such results. It was recorded as a fact that out of 167 persons who had been sentenced to death, 164 had witnessed executions. Formerly, men were hanged for forgery and many other minor offences. The improvement in public opinion on this subject might be illustrated by a case that occurred in the year 1814, when a man was executed at Ohelmsford, in Essex, for cutting down a cherry-tree. It was reported that the Judge on that trial observed, that a man who would cut down a tree maliciously, would not hesitate to kill a man. No Judge at this day would utter such a sentiment. He trusted that public opinion would improve still further, until the punishment of death was finally abolished. In his opinion it was of the greatest importance that the laws and institutions of a country should cherish in the minds of the people a feeling of the sacredness of human life, and he believed that in proportion as capital punishments had been abolished public feeling had been improved. The hon. Gentleman the Member for West Surrey made no allowance for the improved spirit of the age, and according to his doctrine, burning, hanging, and gibbeting alive were to be sanctioned because they had been practised in former times. The hon. Member says, the scriptural command, "Whoso sheddeth man's blood by man shall his blood be shed," is in his opinion as plain as words can make it. He (Mr. Brotherton) had the best authority for declaring that that text was not a command but simply a declaration of the principle of retributive justice. That it was no more to be taken as a justification of the punishment of death than the words of our Saviour, when he said, "He that takes the sword will perish by the sword," or "With what measure ye mete to others it will be measured to you again." If the text were to be taken in the sense in which it was commonly understood, one murder would lead directly to another, and in that case where was blood-shedding to end? He believed that if he had the opportunity he could show that the text of the Old Testament, on which the advocates of capital punishment relied, might be very differently interpreted. The same God gave the laws of the Old Testament that gave the laws of the New; and he would not contradict himself, he would not say, "Thou shalt not kill," and afterwards ordain that the disobedient child, the Sabbath-breaker, or, if an ox killed a man the owner should be put to death. "Putting to death" could not mean in Scripture the taking of the natural life; in many cases it meant excommunication. The crimes which were formerly punished by death, and which are no longer so punished have not increased, but decreased, since that punishment was abolished, and he believed that there was a growing public opinion, that crime diminished in proportion to the mildness of the laws. The State had power over the civil, but it had no right to take the natural life. Man had not the right to destroy his own life, and he had no right to delegate that power to the State. Believing that many important facts might be brought before a Select Committee proving that public executions were demoralising by their example, and did not deter from crime, he should cordially support the Motion of his hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries.

MR. WARNER said, he must complain that the right hon. Baronet, the Home Secretary, had misrepresented the Motion of his hon. Friend (Mr. W. Ewart). He treated it as if it had been for the total and immediate abolition of capital punishment. If this had been its object, he for one could never have given it his support. He did not believe that the punishment of death could be abolished in the present state of society in this country. He hoped the time might come when it would be still more seldom resorted to, or perhaps even abolished altogether. In the meantime it was most desirable to consider of the means which were in our power to provide a substitute in secondary punishments. At present there was no certainty in our secondary punishments. We must find means to overcome the difficulties connected with transportation. We must be prepared to provide a system of severe imprisonment. We might not find it necessary to adopt imprisonment for life with periodical corporal punishment, though he believed that had been tried with success in some countries. But we must, at least, introduce solitary confinement for life, without any hope of pardon. These were important questions for a Committee to consider. Perhaps they might also devise some improvement in the manner of capital punishments, as long as we were compelled to continue them. He did not speak of private execution. No one, he believed, had ever recommended private execution. What had been often proposed here, and had been tried in some States of America, was executions within the walls of the prison, taking place, not privately, but before a numerous jury of witnesses. For these reasons he would support the Motion. He was sorry that the theological question had been introduced into the debate. There was little force in the arguments from it on either side. He maintained, that those who possessed the Sovereign power in every country, be they kings or people, had the power of life and death delegated to them by Providence. They were bound to make such laws as they believed would best secure the great interests of the State, and they were responsible only to God and to their own consciences. As a member of the Legislature of this country, he would never consent to abdicate the right and the responsibility which belonged to it. If they did this, they would deserve to lose their place among the nations, and the high character they held for the justice of the laws, and the uprightness of their administration. But there was room for inquiry, how far these laws could be improved, and with that view he should give his vote for the Motion of his hon. Friend.

Motion made and Question put, "That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the operation of the Law imposing the Punishment of Death."

ADVANCEMENT OF SCIENCE.

MR. HEYWOOD said, he would beg to move for a Select Committee to inquire what public measures could be adopted to advance science, and improve the position of its cultivators. London was remarkable as a great centre of science, and was distinguished by many scientific societies. It was with great pleasure he was able to say that Government had given considerable attention to the subject. In the department of geology it had instituted a school, and it had formed a department of science and art, which was placed under the control of the President of the Council. Science was thus brought into connection with the general education of the country. There were schools already established, of which the most important was the School of Mines, in Jermyn Street, which was especially intended to instruct persons who had the control of mining operations. Many persons, he understood, had derived considerable benefit from an attendance at that excellent institution. The British Government had imitated, in this respect, the conduct of other Governments; for instance, that of Saxony, in which country great progress had been made in consequence of the establishment of a school of that nature at Freiberg. He considered that we were much indebted to the gentlemen who had been placed at the head of those departments, and, in particular, he might allude to the late Sir Henry De la Beche, and to Sir Roderick Murchison. Amongst other institutions of this kind he might mention the Sailors' School at Poplar, in which instruction of a really practical kind was given to a number of industrious persons. Notwithstanding all this, however, there was in this country a great want of scientific instruction. He believed that at Magdalen College, Oxford, it had been recommended by the Oxford Commissioners, that a considerable portion of the college revenues should be set apart for the reward of science in scholarships and fellowships. He trusted that the same thing would be done at Cambridge. It was observed by Professor Liebig, when in this country, that England was remarkable for paying no attention to anything that had not a practical tendency, and that they neglected abstract science, while in Germany the contrary was the case. He considered that they had a most important duty to perform in endeavouring to promote science as much as possible. There was a scientific department which Government had established, in connection with the Board of Trade, under Captain Fitzroy, which was likely to prove exceedingly beneficial, and this was done in imitation of the American Government, who had a similar department under Captain Maury. It was to be wished that the various scientific societies of London should be collected in one spot, and Government had purchased Burlington House, which was to be devoted to that object. It was found that the British Museum, at the present time, was overflowing in various departments, and especially in natural history. They had recently placed Professor Owen over that department, and had given directions that he should give lectures. There was no lecture-room at the Museum, and he would have to give them in Jermyn Street; so that the specimens would have to be carried backwards and forwards. He believed that the British Museum was so overflowing that it would be to the public advantage that there should be a division of its stores, and he thought the natural history department might be removed to the west end of the town. He was exceedingly anxious that scientific men should have a better standing in the country. He did not think that their merits were appreciated by the Government or the public. He did not wish to depreciate others; he thought that, in case of war, Generals, and Admirals, and others who distinguished themselves ought to be honoured, but scientific men were not recognised in any way. He was very much in favour of some

Order of Merit being established for persons in civil departments. With a view to the advancement of science, he would also strongly urge the expediency of some alteration in the system of fees for taking out patents. At present a payment of £25 was required from any person taking out a new invention, and many individuals were not in a position to command that sum, and it appeared that the Attorney and Solicitor Generals received from that source a very large proportion of their salaries. The salaries of those officers ought to be paid out of the Consolidated Fund, and patentees ought to be charged a lower sum. He thought it very important that a Committee should be appointed to inquire into these points, and especially on the subject of education; and without further detaining the House, he would move for the appointment of a Committee on the subject of science.

MR. TITE seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed—

“That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire what public measures can be adopted to advance Science, and improve the position of its cultivators.”

MR. MACKINNON said, he was as much inclined to give every possible encouragement to science as the hon. Gentleman who had brought forward this question, but he would ask the House to consider, before going to a division, what would be the result of assenting to it. According to an old and trite saying—Poeta nascitur non fit, and certainly the men who most distinguished themselves in any particular branch of scientific inquiry were not those upon whose education the largest sums had been expended. To be a scientific man there must be a talent for science. A large amount of property was devoted in this country to the encouragement of the science of mathematics. In the University of Cambridge especially, great mathematical attainments led to fellowships and to livings; but, although the University had produced Professor Airy, and two or three other individuals who were an honour to it from their scientific attainments, how few of its members had arrived at any eminence in mathematics, notwithstanding the advantages they would derive from proficiency in that science. If men of eminence in mathematics could be produced by bestowing wealth upon those who studied mathematics, the members of the University of Cambridge ought to be the first mathematicians of the world. But was that the case? No. The majority of them had very little mathematical knowledge, and the science of mathematics was cultivated to a much greater extent in France than in this country. The conclusion he drew from these facts was, that science was not advanced by having a large amount of property devoted to its encouragement. The two greatest men of science whom this country had lately produced were neither of them members of the University. Neither Herschel, the discoverer of the Georgium Sidus, nor Brunel, the constructor of the Thames tunnel, belonged to the University of Cambridge, or to any great public seminary. They both attained eminence by their individual genius alone. Look at the two discoveries that had been lately made, and which had raised this nation to the highest position among the nations of the world—he meant the application of steam to railways, and the application of electricity to communication. To whom were those discoveries owing? To men of talent, to civil engineers, several of whom were Members of that House, but none of whom had been educated at public seminaries; but whose ability and genius had placed them in the distinguished station in which they now were. An application of the public funds for the purpose of the cultivation of science appeared to him to be perfectly useless. Give the public a general education, and those persons of genius who especially cultivated it rose at once to notoriety. Having been a member for twenty-five years of the Royal Society, he certainly did not think that, as a public body, it did much good either in promoting men of literature or of science. It appeared to him that the society consisted rather of men who had already become eminent in science or other attainments, and who had since become its members, than of men whose knowledge had been enlarged or whose discoveries in science had been stimulated by their becoming members of that society. There was nothing definite in the Motion, and it would require a great deal of discussion in Committee. There would be no harm in that, to be sure, but still, he objected to a proposed Vote to take money out of the public purse for the promotion of science.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, in the object of the Motion of the hon. Gentleman, which is to advance science and to improve the cultivation of it in this country, I feel certain that there is no Member of this House who does not cordially sympathise. But that is not precisely the form in which it presents itself to our acceptance. The hon. Gentleman does not propose any specific measure for that object, but he asks us to assent to a Motion for a Select Committee to inquire what public measures can be adopted to advance science and to improve the position of its cultivators. Now, Sir, without explaining what is the nature of the measure he would recommend for the promotion of that object, he asks us to appoint a Committee, not to consider a plan which he is already prepared to submit, but to investigate generally the means that might be adopted to accomplish the object he has in view. In the course of his speech the hon. Gentleman went through a long list of institutions which have been established for the promotion of art and science. He, at the same time, showed that many of them were for the promotion of certain scientific purposes and for the facility of various national scientific objects. The hon. Gentleman might most truly have added that large sums of the public money had at different times been expended on scientific voyages and travels, and that in that manner the pursuits of science had been largely assisted. But the question really resolves itself into this—whether it would be possible for the Government, by a judicious application of the public money, to give assistance to the cultivation of science. It is true that science does not in general afford any remuneration to those who cultivate it. It is not, like many branches of literature and of art, a remunerative pursuit. But those who cultivate it do so for the love they have for science, and not for the sake of any pecuniary gain, as making that their chief and direct object. But I am not aware that it is possible by any application of the public money to increase the resources of science beyond what are already afforded by the patronage of the Royal Society and the numerous other public institutions that exist—such as the collections in all the various departments of zoology, mineralogy, and natural history, which are under the superintendence of Professor Owen, whose original researches and application in those departments, together with his development of the science of comparative anatomy, are known throughout the whole civilized world; the Botanic Gardens at Kew, where there is a collection of the rarest plants for the study of those who feel an interest in the science of botany; in short,

I am not aware that there is any want of the materials of science in any department, whether as regards the collections of specimens of scientific objects, or of works of scientific pursuits. If it can be shown that there are other things required for promoting the cultivation of science, then, as I understand the object of the hon. Member is not merely the diffusion of a knowledge of science, but the cultivation and improvement of it, I doubt, Sir, very much whether any practical benefit would arise from the appointment of a Committee without some more definite subject of inquiry than that which my hon. Friend proposes for its investigation. If he would come forward and say, "Here is a certain plan or certain suggestions for the advancement of science and the improvement of the position of its cultivators, which I submit to the House and wish to be made the subject of examination before a Select Committee"—that would be matter, no doubt, which might reasonably demand our assent; but when he merely proposes that a Committee should be appointed to consider whether something cannot be found for the promotion of an object which every one admits to be laudable and useful, I confess I entertain great doubts whether any advantage would arise from acceding to his Motion. I confess I rather agree in the speech of the hon. Member for Rye (Mr. Mackinnon) who spoke second in the debate, and which speech appeared to be delivered for the purpose of showing the impropriety of the Motion. Under these circumstances, I trust that my hon. Friend (Mr. Heywood) will not think it necessary to press this Motion to a division, until he is able to propose something definite to the House, but that he will consider his object sufficiently attained by the discussion that has taken place.

MR. TITE said, he wished the House should thoroughly understand the object of the Motion. It originated with the British Association for the Advancement of Science, who, when they met at Glasgow, expressed a strong desire that the question should be considered, and they had twice referred the subject to a Committee in the very terms of the Motion now before the House. On the part of the British Association he distinctly protested against the impression that money was the thing wanted; what was wanted was some means of advancing science. On this subject Professor Liebig observes.

in a letter to Professor Faraday, dated February, 1845, and cited in Lyell's Travels in North America—

"What struck me most in England was the perception that only those works that have a practical tendency awake attention and command respect; while the purely scientific, which possess far greater merit, are almost unknown. And yet the latter are the proper and true source from which the others flow. Practice alone can never lead to the discovery of a truth or a principle. In Germany it is quite the contrary. Here, in the eyes of scientific men, no value, or at least but a trifling one, is placed on the practical results. The enrichment of science is alone considered worthy of attention. I do not mean to say that this is better, for both nations the golden medium would certainly be a real good fortune."

The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer asked that some distinct plan should be suggested. Well, in the pamphlet which he held in his hand, which was the Report of the Parliamentary Committee of the British Association, the plan was distinctly shown. It required that a Board should be constituted, which Board should consist of all the leading men of science in this country, and before whom all plans should be brought that might be proposed for its advancement. This Report also stated that the Royal Society might not be in itself sufficient to answer the questions that constantly arose in connection with science, though it was well known that hitherto the Royal Society had met all the matters submitted to them to the satisfaction of the Government and the public; but still a larger body in the nature of a Council of Science was required to meet the increasing wants of science, and the main object of this Motion was to promote the establishment of such a body. Questions were continually occurring where such a body would be eminently useful. It could be established without any unreasonable expense; probably it would only require the mere expenses attached to keeping up the office of a paid secretary; and when so established, it should be the quarter to which every scientific question should be addressed, and to which the Government should have access at all moments. Mr. Tite, in conclusion, deprecated the idea that men of science were anxious for merely decorative distinctions. On this subject he entirely agreed with Dr. Faraday, who, after speaking of the distinctions, both national and foreign, which may even now be earned, writes—

"I cannot say that I have not valued such distinctions; on the contrary, I esteem them very highly, but I do not think I have ever worked for or sought after them."

LORD STANLEY said, as it appeared to him that the House was not inclined to enter fully into the subject at present, his observations should be very brief. He believed that there was a great deal of force in the objection of the right hon. Baronet the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that the hon. Member who introduced this subject had no specific measure to propose. As far as his (Lord Stanley's) experience went, he did not believe that an inquiry could be well conducted by a Committee, unless there was some distinct proposition submitted for approval or rejection. If the House appointed a Committee merely on the principle of asking all the scientific men who could be collected together to give generally their opinions as to what was best to be done for science, a risk would be run of having a very vague and indefinite inquiry. There was also another objection to the appointment of a Committee now. The middle of June was at hand, and the Session was far advanced, but an inquiry, of the nature proposed by the hon. Member for North Lancashire, to be productive of any useful result, ought to be conducted, not in haste, but in a manner so that the whole country might have ample notice of it. Such being the case, he rather hoped that the hon. Member would not press his Motion at present, but take the opportunity of the coming recess, which doubtless was not far distant, to consult with the most eminent scientific men as to the exact nature of the measures which they might think desirable to be adopted, and submit them in a substantive Motion to the House. That was all he should have said but for one or two remarks which had been thrown out in the course of the debate, and which appeared to him to rest on misconception. He quite allowed that, in the case of the University of Cambridge, there could not be a better mathematical education, up to a certain point, than was there given. He agreed also in the remark, that in point of the practical application of science to mechanics and such matters this country equalled, and probably exceeded, other nations. But between these two points there lay a wide intermediate space, which was not touched. The mathematics of the University as taught were, generally speaking, pure science, and not applied science. Then it was said that a mathematical genius or an inventive genius could not be made by any amount of patronage. That certainly was true; but he thought that there was some confusion as to the distinction between original invention and the diffusion and application of knowledge already existing. As regarded original invention, he allowed that they could not hope by the application of Government funds very greatly to increase the amount, though even in that respect there was probably a number of men qualified for scientific pursuits who were prevented from following them, principally in consequence of the want of means for obtaining that early education which was necessary. But invention was one thing, and the diffusion and application of knowledge already attained another.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I am sure, Sir, the House will believe that any Government must be anxious to promote the diffusion and advancement of science, because that is an object so eminently connected with the best interests of a country—its intellectual progress, its material prosperity, and its commercial advancement—that no man who had found his way to high office in the State could be insensible to the advantages derived from the furtherance of such an object. The difficulty, however, lies in determining how that advancement of science is to be promoted, and I confess I do not think that the appointment of such a Committee as is now proposed by my hon. Friend (Mr. Heywood), particularly, as was suggested by the noble Lord opposite (Lord Stanley), at this late period of the Session, would be likely to lead to any such result. Two modes of accomplishing the desired end have been indicated in the course of this discussion. One, which was immediately disclaimed, is by a grant of money from the Government. It has been said that money is not wanted. But money is wanted in a certain way; that is to say, there are men of science zealously pursuing their investigations, but who have not the means of providing instruments or books from their own funds, and of properly following these researches. To men of that sort there is no doubt that any aid afforded through the Royal Society or other channels must prove of great service, and that the interests of science are thereby advanced. Then it has been suggested that a Board of scientific men should be established, to which questions connected with doubtful points of science might be referred. Now, I confess, Sir, that I have great doubts in my own mind of the advantage of corporate bodies with reference to intellectual improvements. If there is one department of intellect in which a corporate body might perhaps be more expedient than another, it would be in that of painting, because such a body might collect models, encourage the study of those models, provide lectures, and afford great advantage to those who practise the art. At the same time it is well known that there exists a diversity of opinion even upon that point, and I have great doubts whether the establishment of a Board of scientific persons would be productive of any great advantage in the promotion of science. A remark made by Professor Liebig has been quoted, to the effect that there is a great difference between England and Germany in this respect—namely, that while here we look to the practical application of science, in Germany they look more to the theoretical advancement of the principles of science. Well, but it seems to me, Sir, that this is a contrast more striking in words than in things, because, how are you to carry forward to any great extent, and to any successful results, the practical application of science if you do not make advances in the theory upon which that practice is to be founded? Practice without theory is only, in other words, theory without the grounds upon which theory should be founded; and, therefore, I think Professor Liebig's observations have not the force which my hon. Friends behind me would attribute to them. We are certainly an eminently practical nation, and we study the theory of science not with a view simply to abstract reasoning, but with a view to its application to the purposes of life and to the material interests of the country. I can only say that the Government will be at all times most thankful to any persons who can suggest to them anything within the competence of Government to propose or within the scope of Parliament to entertain, which can tend really to the advancement of science; but I think, as my hon. Friend has drawn the attention of Parliament to the subject by his speech, and has elicited the opinions which have been expressed in the course of this debate, he will, perhaps, think he has done enough, at all events in the present Session, and that it would not be advisable to press his Motion to a division, the result of which would be to involve the appearance of a difference of opinion where there really exists no difference at all.

MR. HEYWOOD, in reply, said, he did not wish to divide the House upon the subject. He would have brought the question earlier before the House if an opportunity had offered itself. With regard, however, to the fees paid for obtaining patents, he must point out that the present system was a gross injustice to those individuals who followed scientific pursuits. That was a great impediment in the way of science. The great proportion of the fees paid went into the pockets of the Attorney and Solicitor Generals, and that might in some degree be the reason of the repeated attempts that had been made to count out the House that evening. He therefore hoped the salaries of those officers of the Crown would be put upon a better footing. He would now beg leave to withdraw his Motion, and would endeavour to bring it forward at an earlier period in the next Session.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

RIGHTS OF MARRIED WOMEN.

SIR ERSKINE PERRY said, he rose pursuant to notice, to call the attention of the House to the present state of the law with regard to the rights of married women. The subject was one which had excited considerable interest out of doors, and during the Session no less than seventy petitions had been presented complaining of the law as it affected the property of married women. Some of those petitions bore the signatures of the most thoughtful portion of society; the most marked one of the whole, perhaps, was the one which he presented before Easter, which was signed by 3,000 women, amongst whom were ladies who had made the present epoch remarkable in the annals of literature. It was only by accident that these ladies had entrusted him with the charge of presenting their views to the House. At the annual meeting of the Law Amendment Society, he spoke a few words on the subject of the rights of married women, and those observations coming to the notice of the memorialists, they determined to entrust their petition to his hands. Neither was it upon any sudden impulse, or without due meditation, that he had ventured to bring this question forward; for in the judicial situation which he had had the honour to hold, the question had often forced itself upon his mind. Having, then, had every opportunity for considering the question, and having most carefully looked into it, he could unhesitatingly pronounce his solemn conviction that the law of England, as it affected the property of married women, was not only discreditable to the age, but that it demanded immediate alteration. By the old English law there could be no doubt that a wife succeeded on equal terms, with women of other nations, to the common property of her husband; she was entitled to one-third of the land, and one-third of the personal property. The decrees of the legal tribunals of the country, however, had abrogated this old English law, and deprived married women of their rights, while the husband had acquired the right from the same source, of dealing with the property of his wife just as he thought fit. The law had not been changed by any act of the Legislature, but solely by the decisions of the Judges. According to the dictum of the common law, a married woman had no right to personal property, but the Equity Courts recognised and acted upon the very opposite principle. Equity dealt with the personal property of a wife as though she were a single woman, but the common law held that it belonged to the husband. These diametrically opposite views of the law had arisen out of the decisions of different Judges, and the object of his bringing the question now before the House was to elicit an opinion as to which of the two principles was the sound one, as applicable to the case of married women. The rule which enabled families to settle property upon females before marriage was a correct one—it was founded in justice, and useful to society; but while the Legislature admitted the expediency of that law, it was equally incumbent upon them to reconcile the conflicting principles of law and equity which now prevailed with regard to the rights of married women. Now, to what did this conflict between the two classes of Courts tend? Why, to this, that those who are rich, and are able to apply to the Courts of Equity, have the means of defeating the stringent injustice of the common law. It tended, also, to show that for the rich there was one law, and for the poor another; but then that description was not strictly applicable. It was accurate to divide society into two classes of rich and poor. There were a great mass, perhaps the bulk, of the community who were happily removed above poverty, but who were not yet rich enough to go into the Courts of Equity, and this class had a strong claim upon the Legislature to be put in the same position with respect to the rights of property as the more wealthy. It was not necessary to describe the existing state of common law with respect to the property of women, as the facts were familiar and of every-day occurrence. It was incumbent upon him, however, to prove that he was not insisting upon a theoretical grievance. He had been met by the objection that though the rule might present a hardship, yet practically it did neither mischief nor wrong, for where there was property, settlements beforehand might be made; where no property, settlements were unnecessary. It was, however, a serious practical grievance that he complained of; but the proofs of it would occupy too much time for him to go fully into them on the present occasion. Suffice it that there was one sort of case which had been reported to him in dozens ever since he had given notice of his intention to bring forward this subject; such, for instance, as that of a man who, leaving his wife, went to live in adultery, or, at all events, to lead a life of viciousness, and yet came in to claim her property. Instances innumerable had come to his knowledge where the wife, so abused and neglected, had been enabled by her industry to set up in business, and yet the brute of a man could, and did, come down upon her, after a few months' absence, and seize the proceeds of her labour under the sanction of the law. Now, he would ask hon. Members if it was fitting or just that they should any longer give the sanction of law to such iniquities? It certainly would not be difficult to frame a simple remedy. All that would be necessary would be to abolish the artificial rule of common law which had grown up, and to apply exactly the same principle to the property of the wife as was applied to the property of the husband. If no antenuptial contract was entered into, let the property of the wife remain in her own hands, and be disposed of at her death in the manner she might choose to direct. No doubt some further rules would have to be laid down with regard to the wife's obligation to the support of her children, and to contribute to the charges of the joint household. Some alteration, however, should be made with regard to the absurd laws relating to debts contracted by the wife before marriage—for absurd they undoubtedly were. A husband, after marriage, was not bound to pay any debt his wife might contract unless they were for such things as were suitable for her station in life; and yet he was responsible for any debts whatever that she might have contracted before marriage, although he might never have so much as dreamt of their existence. The difference of the two rules was itself enough to demonstrate that one of them was absurd, and, necessarily, that one of them ought to be altered. In conclusion, he ventured to appeal to his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General, whom he knew to be a sound law reformer, to apply his mind to this subject, and to satisfy himself whether the conflict between common law and equity ought not to cease? If there must be any difference between the rights of husband and wife, the woman ought to be the favoured party, for she was the weaker, and assuredly stood more in need of the protection of the law. Let it not be supposed that he entertained any novel or theoretical notions on the position which women ought to occupy in society. The Resolutions he wished to propose were practical ones, and were intended to meet a real and practical grievance. No one could recognise more clearly than he the principle that the fitting place for woman was not to be engaged in a struggle with man for her bread. In nine cases out of ten the stronger sex must bear off the prize. He wished rather to see her enshrined in her own home, relieved from the carking cares of life, and enabled to make her home, however humble, a place of light and joy to her husband. But he could not overlook the fact, that in the existing state of society there were hundreds and thousands of women to whom no such description could apply. The laws of property pressed most grievously upon the interests of such, for those laws were the product of a rude age, and applied to a state of civilisation wholly different from our own, and ought to be altered or modified, now that so many women were found in the manufacturing districts and elsewhere earning the means of subsistence by their own labour. He might refer to the example of a nation in many respects resembling ourselves, and in jurisprudence immeasurably our superiors. Originally the Roman law treated women as mere chattels; but at a very early period that was altered, and where, in all antiquity, could they find women equal in every civil virtue to the matrons of the Roman Commonwealth? The Minister who, in the present day, would bring forward a comprehensive measure to extirpate the evils of which he complained would not only effect a great social improvement, but would show himself fit to hold the helm of this country at the present critical period.

LORD STANLEY seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed—

“That the rules of common law which give all the personal property of a woman in marriage, and all subsequently acquired property and earnings, to the husband, are unjust in principle and injurious in their operation.”

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he cordially concurred in the Resolution of his hon. and learned Friend (Sir E. Perry). He quite agreed with him that the rules of the common law were injurious and unjust, that they were no longer applicable to the present state of society, that the rules acted upon by the Courts of Equity were much more consistent with the requirements of the age, and that the conflicting rules and principles of the two systems ought to be brought into unison. On the other hand, he would urge his hon. and learned Friend not to press the House to adopt his Resolution, for, if it were proposed to amend the law in a matter of this kind, it would be much better to proceed by introducing a Bill for that purpose than by calling on the House to discuss an abstract Resolution, which was, in fact, making it neither more nor less than a debating society. He had communicated with his noble Friend the Lord Chancellor upon the subject, and that noble Lord fully concurred with him in thinking that the time had come when the common law and equity ought, upon this point at all events, to be reconciled. The best attention of the legal authorities connected with the Government would, during the recess, be given to the subject, and he hoped that in the next Session of Parliament they should be able to introduce a more comprehensive and more satisfactory measure upon the subject. He might take that opportunity of saying that he should look upon such a measure, if it were passed, as only a part of a far greater one, for which the time had fully arrived, namely, the removal of the inconsistencies existing between common law and equity, by making the more rigid and stubborn maxims of the common law consistent with equity—that was, with reason, justice, and common sense. He hoped that his hon. and learned Friend would be satisfied with the assurance which he had given him, and would not press his Resolution.

Mr. MALINS said, he must deny that the existing law placed any distinction between rich and poor, as the hon. and learned Member for Devonport (Sir E. Perry) seemed to suppose. The rule of Equity was a very simple one. Before marriage any woman might herself, and after marriage her friends might for her, take steps to secure her property to her separate use. The simplest instrument that could be devised would be quite sufficient for that purpose. If all that was desired by the hon. and learned Member was to assimilate the rules of Law and Equity, the proposal of the hon. and learned Gentleman should receive his cordial support; and for that purpose a very simple enactment, he apprehended, would suffice. If, however, the hon. and learned Gentleman wished to go further than that—if he wished to set up a separate establishment in every house—then he must resist it to the utmost extent of his power. If it was meant that henceforth the husband should have his establishment and the wife hers, he must regard the proposal as contrary not only to the law of England, but to the law of God. The law of England with regard to matrimony, as it at present stood, was founded upon the soundest principle—upon the principle, namely, that when a man and woman married they became one, and that their property ought not, therefore, to be separated. If a woman had not full confidence in a man let her refrain from marrying him; but still, as the law stood, she might, if she thought fit, protect herself. If during coverture property devolved upon her, it would no doubt become the property of her husband, and his receipt for it would be perfectly good. That was equally the rule of the Courts of Common Law as well as of Equity. But there was this difference between the two. If a woman had not complete confidence in her husband, and if he were a bankrupt, she might go to the Court of Equity and press it to assign her a settlement. The usual rule in such cases was to give her one half, but she might get three-fourths, or even the whole. Could anything be more reasonable than that? But it was said a married woman might set up in business for herself, and her husband would have a right to seize the fruits of her industry. If the husband was an assenting party, she might contract with him that quoad the business she should be as if she were still a femme sole. Of course, except under what was called an equitable settlement, no contract between a husband and a wife during her coverture would be good as against his creditors. But did the hon. and learned Gentleman propose to give a wife power to set up in business in defiance of her husband, and to conduct it so as not to be liable for his debts. Certainly he (Mr. Malins) was not prepared to go so far as that. Indeed, there were some who thought that the whole equity doctrine of separate use was based upon an erroneous principle; and he was himself so impressed with the necessity of insisting on the perfect identity in all things of husband and wife, so convinced of the tendency of settlements to foster habits of extravagance on both sides, that, taking an enlarged view of the case, he was not satisfied that the doctrine in question had not proved detrimental to the best interests of society. He most solemnly protested against the new doctrine springing up, that it was for the interests of society that the wife should have separate interests from those of her husband. He believed that the interests of society involved quite a contrary principle, and he therefore hoped that the House would maintain the law in that respect as it now stood.

Mr. MUNTZ said, he would remind the hon. and learned Member for Wallingford that the necessity for an alteration of the law arose from the impossibility of a separation, under any circumstances whatever, in the case of a poor man and his wife. He himself knew several instances in which profligate husbands had squandered the property acquired by their wives to whose support they did not contribute one farthing, and he thought justice demanded that when the conduct of a man was such that his wife could not live with him, he should not be entitled to seize the fruits of her industry. Some alteration of the law was imperatively called for.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, that the real state of the law had not been represented by the hon. and learned Member for Wallingford (Mr. Malins) with his usual accuracy; while, on the other hand, he could not congratulate the hon. and learned Member for Devonport (Sir E. Perry) on the clearness of his Resolution, with respect to the evil that required to be redressed. The Common Law, on an occasion of marriage, made a qualified gift of the property of the wife, present and future, to the husband. The qualification consisted in the property being given to the husband, subject to the obligation of maintaining the wife; but the defect of the Common Law lay in the circumstance that it made no provision to compel the husband to perform that obligation. The true evil, therefore, was—and it was one that cried loudly for a remedy—that the husband, abandoning his duty, might totally neglect the obligation of maintaining his wife while possessing himself of all her property. In that respect, if the Resolution of the hon. and learned Member for Devonport had been properly worded, it would have contained a proposition highly deserving the attention of the House—not with a view to the introduction of a new principle into the law, as the hon. and learned Member for Wallingford supposed, but to enable the law to carry out its own humane principle, and to prevent that hardship which arose from the circumstance that, while the law imposed an obligation in words, it supplied no means by which that obligation could be enforced. There was another particular in which there was a difference between the rules of Common Law and those of Equity, and in which he thought it would be desirable that the Common Law should adopt the principles of Equity. In the case of property acquired by a wife during marriage, when there had been no settlement made for the fulfilment of the obligation imposed by the Common Law, Equity interposed when the property could be got only through the medium of the Court of Chancery, and refused to assist the husband in obtaining possession of the property, unless he consented to dedicate part of it to the maintenance of his wife. Such was one mode in which the Courts of Equity endeavoured to secure that which the Common Law required—the performance of the duty imposed upon the husband to provide for the support of the wife; and it well deserved consideration whether that rule should not be made universal and applied to all property, whether obtained by the husband through the medium of Courts of Equity or not. He confessed, at the same time, that, like his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Wallingford, he had some misgivings with regard to the extent to which Courts of Equity had carried the doctrine of separation of interests. He might mention, as an example, one case which occurred not long ago. On the occasion of a marriage a large property was settled for the separate maintenance of the wife. The wife ran away with an adulterer. The husband obtained a divorce a vinculo, and, although there were several children by the marriage, all the property settled for the separate maintenance of the wife went to the adulterer, and not one farthing could be applied to the support of the children. He should not therefore desire to see that general assimilation which seemed to be suggested in the imperfectly worded Resolution of the hon. and learned Member for Devonport. But the subject deserved the most careful consideration, and when the Bill which at present engaged the attention of the other branch of the Legislature on the subject of marriage and divorce came down to that House, it might not be impossible to insert a provision securing to married women who were deserted by their husbands the right of enjoying in safety the fruits of their own industry. The question lay too much at the foundation of all our social interests, and was too closely connected with the very constitution of society itself, to be dealt with lightly, rashly, or by piecemeal. He trusted, therefore, that the hon. and learned Member for Devonport would accept the assurance given by his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General, that the subject would not escape attention, and, entertaining the hope that something might be done when the Marriage and Divorce Bill came down from the House of Lords, would withdraw his Resolution, which certainly was not framed in such a manner as to put the real question clearly and distinctly before the House.

MR. WHITESIDE said, he fully concurred with the hon. and learned Solicitor General in thinking that there was a loud call for an amendment of the law on the subject under discussion. He would venture to express a hope that somebody might appear with vigour and capacity to remedy an evil so much deplored. The discussion which had taken place that evening showed how important it would be to have a Minister of Justice capable of dealing with such questions, in order that Parliament might not always be deploring the existence of evils, but might be in a condition to apply speedy and practical remedies.

MR. J. G. PHILLIMORE said, he thought that some amendment was required in the law of divorce, but he trusted that the Legislature would maintain unbroken the ideality of interest between husband and wife. Nothing could surely be more frightful than to teach wives that their interests were on one side, and those of their husband on the other. He thought there were many matters in which we might usefully follow the example of foreign nations; but, if there was one thing more essential than another which foreigners might learn of us, it was the relations which existed in this country between husband and wife. He fully agreed with the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Malins) who thought that Equity had gone too far with the doctrine of separate uses; and when people talked of the sufferings which the law caused women, what could be more natural, what more desirable for women to know, than that, if they acted foolishly and contracted imprudent marriages, they must bear the consequences? The law of divorce, as it now stood, was a scandal to the country; and he did not anticipate any very decided amendment from the measure of the Lord Chancellor. What he would suggest was, that when a sentence of separation was pronounced, the same authority should pronounce a decision as to the wife's property. At present the evils of the law of divorce were most strikingly exemplified amongst the lower classes, especially in the case of bigamy. The measure before them was of a piecemeal character; and he thought the evil could only be met in the way proposed by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General.

MR. COLLIER said, that they could not adopt any other than piecemeal measures until there was some officer in this country in the nature of a Minister of Justice, charged with the duty of proposing and carrying out the necessary amendments in the law.

MR. W. J. FOX said, that the consolation which a Court of Equity was enabled to afford the wife for the injury and the privation to which she was often subjected at the hands of her husband was of a very cold description indeed. He had himself seen mention made within the last few weeks of two cases of a most distressing nature, in which the wives having been deserted by their husbands, and having been left families to support, had succeeded by their industry in accumulating a small sum of money, which had subsequently been squandered by the husbands, who had rejoined them, and who had in consequence reduced these poor creatures to a state of the utmost destitution. A hard case had also occurred a few days ago, in which a woman possessing a property of £400 or £500 a year had been married, and the entire of her property had gone to her husband's heir-at-law, leaving her penniless. The late celebrated Mrs. Siddons had by the exercise of her great talents accumulated a large fortune; but she had been obliged to beg of her husband not to leave her dependent upon others by disposing of that fortune to her prejudice by his will. Hon. Members could not have failed to see in the public press frequent advertisements from husbands announcing that they would not be responsible for the debts which their wives might contract—a circumstance which, taken together with the cases to which he had before alluded, could not fail to show that the state of the law as affecting the relations of husband and wife was most unsatisfactory, and demanded amendment. It was, therefore, with pleasure that he had listened to the statement of the hon. and learned Attorney General to the effect that the Government would take the matter into their immediate consideration.

MR. T. CHAMBERS said, he thought that, whatever might be the number and pressure of the grievances complained of by his hon. and learned Friend (Sir E. Perry) they would bear no comparison to the mischiefs that would follow from the assertion of the vicious principle involved in the Resolution before the House. All the evils to which his hon. and learned Friend referred arose from a breach of the obligations of religion and morality in the married state; but the proposal now before the House would give the force of law to evils infinitely greater. No doubt the evils which now existed required remedy and ought to be attended to; but to introduce into every house in England the principle of separate rights, separate interests, and a separate legal existence between man and wife, was to nullify and destroy the law of marriage altogether, so far as regarded its sacredness and sanctity. The publication of such advertisements as "I will not be responsible for the debts of my wife" showed that it was not always a profligate and drunken husband who committed wrong, but that there were numerous instances in which a man's home was made wretched by the profligacy of a drunken wife. Evils without doubt existed on both sides, and they sprang from the breach of the laws of morality and religion; but the evils which would spring from the proposed alteration of the law would be far worse, for they would be the result of legislation. He thought the hon. and learned Solicitor General took a right view of the question, and he therefore trusted that he would be able to effect a sufficient remedy.

Mr. W. J. Fox

SIR ERSKINE PERRY said, he would have been delighted with the assurance of his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General had it not been followed by the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General. He was afraid, looking at that speech, that years might elapse before a satisfactory marriage law would be carried out; but still he had such confidence in his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General that he would withdraw his Resolution, and look forward to a speedy rectification of the evils which he had too feebly, perhaps, pointed out.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

POSTAGE LABELS.

MR. WHITESIDE said, he rose to move for the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire into the circumstances connected with the purchase by Government from Mr. Archer, of the machine and invention for perforating postage labels, and also with reference to the printing and gumming postage and receipt labels. He wished to point out that a few years ago Mr. Archer invented a machine for facilitating the separation of postage labels, an invention hon. Members could not but admit of great utility. Mr. Archer believing that the invention would be successful, applied to a public department with the object of effecting its sale. Such a transaction would doubtless have been arranged by mercantile men in a quarter of an hour, but unfortunately Mr. Archer had to deal with three great departments of the State—the Post Office, the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, and the Treasury. No one, as hon. Members must be well aware, who had anything useful to propose was received with favour by our public departments; if he had nothing but his ability to recommend him to their notice. A lengthened correspondence took place between Mr. Archer and the public departments referred to, and he (Mr. Whiteside) had been extremely amused by that correspondence, which with great ability and uncommon perseverance, had been carried on between the inventor and certain official functionaries for a series of years, it having been found utterly impossible, of course, to persuade them of the usefulness of the proposed machine. Eventually, through the intervention of Mr. Keogh, Secretary to the Board of Inland Revenue, an agreement was concluded to this effect:—

"The Commissioners of Inland Revenue agree with Mr. Archer for the purchase of two machines for separating postage labels, on condition that he is not to be repaid the cost of the same, or compensated for his invention, until the plan is brought into successful operation."

When the success of the invention had been demonstrated, Mr. Archer applied to the Board of Inland Revenue, and, after having bestowed three years' labour, and expended £1,500 in perfecting the machine, that department offered him £100 for his invention. Afterwards they made him another offer of £300; and, gradually increasing in their bids, the Treasury eventually offered the inventor £2,000. Now, after three years' labour and the expenditure he had incurred, Mr. Archer was stubborn and determined, but the public departments were inexorable. They knew they had to deal with a man who possessed no political influence, and who had nothing but his abilities to recommend him, and they therefore determined to persist in their injustice. At last the right hon. Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. Gladstone), became Chancellor of the Exchequer, and seeing that the invention would be useful to the country he followed up an offer which had been made by his predecessor to Mr. Archer of £300 a year, a share of the proceeds of the postage labels in proportion to the quantity issued, and a sum in hand. By offering Mr. Archer £4,000, and after some four or five years' negotiation, an arrangement was effected on the terms mentioned, which, according to the words of the agreement, related to postage labels only. Mr. Archer, however, foresaw that his invention would be useful also for perforating bankers' checks, and had, he (Mr. Whiteside) understood, entered into contracts with certain bankers in the city to apply his machines to that purpose, believing that his agreement with the Board of Inland Revenue extended only to the application of the invention to postage labels. Soon after Mr. Archer had effected his arrangement with the then Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Gladstone) that right hon. Gentleman busied himself with the invention of fresh modes of taxing the community. The right hon. Gentleman hit on the ingenious expedient of introducing a penny receipt stamp. This novelty complicated a question already sufficiently confused. Mr. Archer's invention was made the subject of additional inquiries, and the gentleman to whom the question was ultimately referred for decision recommended that an assignment of the patent right should be taken, and that the machine should be also used for the purpose of perforating the bankers' stamps. The Government then gave Mr. Archer to understand that a gentleman in the city had made experiments upon his machine, and that £500 had been expended in attempts to improve it, which sum they insisted upon deducting from the £4,000 agreed to be paid to Mr. Archer. In vain did Mr. Archer remonstrate. He was told once for all that before he received a shilling from the Government he must give a guarantee to pay the £500 to the gentleman in the city; and what aggravated the difficulties of his position was that the gentleman in question refused to accept the security, and declared that he must be paid in money—a demand with which Mr. Archer was unable to comply. About this time the gentleman who conducts the legal affairs of the Treasury began to interfere in the business, and gave it as his opinion that no licence to perforate bankers' stamps should be granted to Mr. Archer, and that the use of his patent for all purposes whatsoever should be transferred to the Treasury. In vain did Mr. Archer protest, remonstrate, resist, and threaten an appeal to Parliament. The Treasury, of course, were too strong for him. They got the assignment from him of his patent right and retain it to this day. They not only refused him a licence to perforate receipt stamps, but they also declined to allow him any additional consideration for the services of his machine in that respect. Nothing, he would appeal to the House, could be more illiberal, more ungenerous, than such treatment. But their injustice did not end there. They would not allow him to superintend the operations which his tender originally contemplated—those of engraving, printing, and gumming, as well as of perforating—but they committed all those matters to other hands, and the consequence was, that the texture of the postage labels was coarse, their colour bad, there was much difficulty in separating them, and, in a word, the English public had the worst article of the kind in all Europe at the very dearest price. Had the arrangements been confided to Mr. Archer, the person best qualified to superintend the working of his own invention, the postage labels would have been struck off by a process of surface-printing similar to that used in the Bank of England, and a superior description of gum would have been employed, instead of the filthy poisonous stuff that was now provided for us by the parental kindness of the Treasury. But the health of the people as well as the claims of justice were disregarded to facilitate the perpetration of a disreputable little job. The consequence was that an article was produced which was a reproach to art and a disgrace to the country. He would leave it to the candid decision of the hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Treasury to say, whether the postage label used in England was not greatly inferior to anything of the same kind in France, or, indeed, in any other country of the world. In order to understand the unfair manner in which Mr. Archer had been treated it would be necessary to refer to the correspondence that had taken place between him and the Treasury. On the 30th of April, 1851, he wrote to Mr. Keogh to say that he was willing to undertake—

“In conjunction with Mr. Branston, who for many years held the appointment of engraver to the late Commissioners of Excise, to engrave, print, gum, and perforate the sheets of postage labels, and to find and prepare all the necessary printing machinery, plates, and apparatus, and also all perforating machines that may be required (except the present) for the sum of 4½d. for every 1,000 stamps.”

As this proposal, however, referred to a mode of engraving and printing materially differing from the one then in use, Mr. Archer proceeded to make some remarks in reference to the comparative merits of the two systems, and having done so, concluded his letter by stating that should—

“The Commissioners deem it advisable not to change the present mode of engraving and printing the labels, he was prepared to undertake to engrave and print the same according to the existing plan, and also to gum and perforate them, and to find all the necessary printing machinery and plates, with all the usual guarantees required, for the sum of 5d. for every 1,000 stamps; so that, even according to the latter proposal, the Commissioners would be enabled to save the Post-office £1,500 per annum.”

The Board of Inland Revenue had this letter in their hands on the 16th May, and mark how they proceeded. Instead of putting themselves in communication with Mr. Archer, or offering the contract to public competition, they took a most disingenuous course, for on that very day the solicitor to the “Board,” wrote to Bacon and Petch, their old engravers, stating that a tender had been made to print the labels at 5d. (which was not true, for the tender was to print, perforate, and gum them at that price) per 1,000, and asking if they would abate their price from 7d. to 6d. per 1,000. Of course they assented; and without any notice to Mr. Archer, the contract was concluded with them for five years to do the printing at 6d. per 1,000, he having tendered to do the printing, perforating, and gumming, at 5d. per 1,000. The Committee who had sat upon the subject, and of which the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Muntz) was a member, had expressed their opinion upon this transaction. They had passed a Resolution—

“That the tender having been made by Mr. Archer to print, perforate and paste the labels at 5d. per 1,000, a smaller sum than had been paid for the printing alone, it was inexpedient to communicate the terms of the tender to the former contractors.”

“Inexpedient!”—a delicate expression certainly. He would beg to translate it freely, liberally, and to stigmatise such conduct as unjust and iniquitous. The Committee further reported that, in renewing the contract with Messrs. Bacon and Petch, it was not necessary, neither was it for the interest or the convenience of the public, that it should have been made for five years. A discussion arose in the Committee as to the best mode of printing the postage labels, and three of the most scientific witnesses declared that the system of surface printing must ultimately prevail. Yet the Government alleged that they could not help themselves, being bound by their contract with Messrs. Bacon and Petch for a period of five years, and thus a clear profit actually exceeding the salary allowed to the Prime Minister, or more than £5,000 a year, was secured to that firm! The contract entered into with Messrs. Bacon and Petch having been printed by order of the House, a copy of it was submitted by Mr. Archer to Mr. V. Williams, whose legal opinion, together with that of another eminent barrister, was, that the compact was not binding on the Treasury for five years. Still the extravagant arrangement went on, and enormous profits were pocketed by the contractors, because competition was precluded. The particulars of this job were not yet exhausted—more still remained. Mr. Archer, persevering in his views with regard to surface-printing, called on Mr. E. Hill, a secretary to one of the Boards, and explained the facts to him. But Mr. E. Hill was so slow to see the superriority of Mr. Archer's process, that he did not see it until the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Hankey) had written to him, stating that the Bank of England had adopted it, and would before long print all their notes by it, adding—"I cannot understand why the process is not made use of for the postage labels, since ours are by far the most clumsily and badly executed." Well, two or three years after the "Board" had received Mr. Archer's tender to do the whole of the labels upon the superior process, this Mr. E. Hill began to think of securing it for the Government. Admitting, however, for the sake of argument, that the Treasury were restricted by the contract for five years, as far as concerned the postage labels, yet they might have subjected the receipt labels to the open competition of the trade. Now, Mr. Hill was the partner of Mr. Delarue, the stationer, in a patent for cutting envelopes; but, obtaining an excellent Government appointment, he immediately sold his right to the patent, and managed to give to his former co-partner, at the modest price of 7d. per 1,000, the contract which an expert man offered to execute by a superior process at 2½d. per 1,000. Perhaps a more monstrous instance of jobbery had never occurred. Why were they to have a bad envelope, made of paper so thin that the writing may be seen through it, merely that a favour might be conferred upon some person who was perhaps a friend of one of the department? The receipt stamp, he admitted, was far better than the clumsy article of which he had been complaining. Why, he asked as a man of business, were they to have a good receipt stamp and a bad postage label? The answer would doubtless be, that they must fulfil the terms of the contract; and the system would be continued unless the House of Commons granted the inquiry he now demanded. The respectable stationers in the city had no confidence in the contract system pursued by the Government, which they averred was not carried out openly by public advertisement. In the Estimates which had been laid before the House during the present year, the total sum required for postage labels was £29,000, of which £8,000 was for the manufacture of a new postage stamp for the conveyance of newspapers. He supposed the latter sum was for the manufacture of a die for the impression of stamps upon newspapers, and, if so, a very handsome article of that description he was certain could be procured for £50. Who, then, had got the £8,000? He wanted to find out the whole truth if he could, although he would not say that he should succeed in doing so; but, at all events, if the Committee asked for were granted, he would rely upon the good sense and feeling of the Members who composed it to assist him. All the justice Mr. Archer had received had been from that House, and not from the departments. At first, the departments squeezed from that gentleman the entire right to his patent; then refused him a licence; then deducted £500 from the £4,000 they offered him, ousted him from the contract, and yet made good use of his principle for receipt labels; and then gave another person nearly three times the amount for which he was willing to give them a good and satisfactory article. He (Mr. Whiteside) would like to inquire into those matters, and doubted not but that some interesting communication between some persons would transpire, the result of which was that one party obtained a contract which was worth something more than the salary of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He had brought forward the subject upon no grounds of personal or political nature, but simply relying upon the good sense of the House to do justice to an injured and an ill-used man, and he had no doubt but it would give the whole case a fair consideration, and after hearing what the hon. Secretary for the Treasury had to say in reply, would, he hoped, grant him the Committee he moved for. He did not mean to say that the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury was a party to the job, but he hoped that hon. Gentleman would not attempt to defend that which was indefensible. If, however, the hon. Gentleman should succeed in proving to a Committee that the departments were free from blame, he (Mr. Whiteside) would be the first to admit the validity of the defence, and to compliment the hon. Gentleman upon his skill in proving it.

MR. WILSON said, that though the hon. and learned Member had exonerated him from personal blame in respect of many of the transactions to which he had alluded, he had not gone on to say who had represented the Government of the day in the Committee which had sat upon this subject, and who consequently were really responsible for the Report of that Committee. That Committee sat in April and May, 1852, and was attended by the Marquess of Chandos, as the representative of the Government of Lord Derby, and than whom a more painstaking Member never sat upon a Committee; therefore, the parties really responsible for that Report were Lord Derby's Government. He (Mr. Wilson) could not pretend to be cognisant of all matters attendant upon the subject, but he would remind the House that they had been brought before the Committee, which had, in consequence, fully investigated the subject. Hence, what had taken place before the Committee sat was hardly a question at the present moment. The Committee had expressed their opinion after due consideration, and it was therefore not to be expected that after four years had elapsed the House would grant a Committee again to investigate the subject. But, in truth, the most important part of the hon. and learned Gentleman's speech was that in which he referred to what had taken place since the Committee reported; the other facts had only been introduced in order that he might heighten, like a skilful advocate, that which was to come. Now he (Mr. Wilson) would take the liberty of informing the House what had actually taken place in consequence of the recommendation of the Committee. The colleagues of the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Whiteside) in pursuance of that Report, entered into correspondence with Mr. Archer. They made him such offers as in accordance with their duty to the country they thought right, but those offers were not agreeable to or at all events did not meet Mr. Archer's views. In the year 1853, as the hon. and learned Gentleman had stated, his (Mr. Wilson's) right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. Gladstone) then Chancellor of the Exchequer, received a deputation, urging upon him the expediency of purchasing the patent of Mr. Archer. He should state to the House that the highest and most liberal offer of Lord Derby's Government had been £2,000, coupled with some offer of a commission upon the sale of postage stamps. On the 24th of May, 1853, he (Mr. Wilson) found that he made a memorandum, stating that the Chancellor of the Exchequer having intimated his willingness to purchase the patent in question for £4,000, the Lords of the Treasury were pleased to request their solicitor to place himself in communication with Mr. Archer, and to take steps in order to obtain a legal assignment of the patent to Colonel Maberly, in trust for the public. In consequence of this the solicitor to the Treasury put himself into communication with Mr. Archer, and stated the conditions of the bargain to him. Mr. Archer wished, however, although the patent was to be assigned, that there should be an understanding that he might apply to Parliament for further compensation. The Treasury (acting upon the advice of their solicitor) replied, that although they could not prevent Mr. Archer from appealing to Parliament, they did not think it right to enter into any such understanding as he desired. Mr. Archer also made known to the Treasury that there were several incumbrances in existence affecting his rights, which he had incurred in the prosecution of his inventions. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Enniskillen made much of this, and seemed to think that the Treasury had taken the part of these incumbrances. But the fact was, that there was a legal mortgage affecting Mr. Archer's patent, and until that was discharged the interest in the invention could not be properly vested in the Government. On the 20th June, Mr. Archer having consented to assign the patent without condition, the Solicitor to the Treasury wrote to the Secretary of the Treasury, stating that fact, and enclosing the assignment, the original letters, and the mortgage to which he had already referred, and giving instructions with regard to the closing of the transaction. Those instructions were ultimately acted upon, and the transaction closed. In the course of the negotiation which took place, Mr. Archer at one time expressed a desire to limit the grant to the Government to the right of perforating postage labels only. That, however, the Chancellor of the Exchequer did not think it right to accede to, for he considered that the purchase of the patent should be for the benefit of the public generally, so that while the Government availed themselves of it for the purpose of perforating postage stamps, it might be equally available to the public for all other purposes. The hon. and learned Gentleman had also made reference to the subject of surface printing, now a matter not very fit for public discussion. Where they were collecting upwards of £2,000,000 of money in separate pennies, security was the first consideration. Three or four years ago, the Government were induced by representations made to them to attach great importance to the new discovery of surface printing, but with the knowledge acquired by experiments they were disposed to consider the old style by far the safest. The transactions in 1850 and 1851, having already been inquired into by a Select Committee, could not properly be made the subject of another investigation, unless it could be shown that they bore on the purchase of the patent right. He thought he had proved that the purchase was altogether independent of previous transactions, and up to the present time he had never heard of any complaint showing that Mr. Archer was not satisfied with the arrangement. He thought that the House would not assent to the Motion of the hon. and learned Member.

Mr. GREGAN said, that the whole of the case could be condensed into a very small compass. A man of ability had invented a machine of great usefulness to the public—so useful, indeed, that the Government had considered it necessary to purchase the patent. Now, the object of the Government at the time was to perforate postage stamps, because the perforation of cheques and bankers' drafts was not then thought of. Mr. Archer, however, had ulterior objects in view, and wished to reserve a portion of his right. It was true that Mr. Greenwood, of the Treasury, told him that he did not see how the Government could buy the patent, and yet allow him a right to sell it to bankers; but what Mr. Archer wanted was, that a power should be given him of licensing bankers and others who might wish to use the patent for the purposes alluded to. On that point the agreement was not specific; but when Mr. Archer afterwards wished to exercise such a power, the Government refused to allow him to do so. Considering the enormous amount of property which might be saved to the public were the contracts re-adjusted, and considering that the existing contracts were about shortly to expire, he thought the House would be acting with manifest neglect of what was due to the country if it refused to grant the Committee.

Mr. LLOYD DAVIES said, he could not help thinking that there was some want of grace on the part of the inventor of the patent in thus coming forward to make a claim upon the Government, after he had unreservedly sold his invention to them for a sum of £4,000. There could be no doubt that the gentleman in question had transferred his machine to the Government, and parted with his entire interest in it; and with what grace could he now demand additional compensation, because he found his invention was applicable to other purposes? He, therefore, could not support the Motion on the ground alleged. At the same time he thought some explanation was due on the part of the Government as to their paying 7½d. for what they might get for 2½d. The part of the Motion directed to that point should certainly have his support.

Mr. MUNTZ said, there was one portion of the subject that ought to be borne in mind, that, however Government had settled with Mr. Archer, they had not settled with him in good faith. They purchased the machinery and patent right merely for the perforation of postage-stamps. That, however, was the smallest part of the question; the largest was, how had the public been dealt with in the matter? The copper-plate process admitted of forgery, and in a conversation which he had had twelve months ago with the Secretary of the Treasury, that hon. Gentleman informed him that they were going to do away with it, and adopt the surface printing in regard to postage-stamps. There was also this proof that they considered the surface printing so superior, that they had adopted it in the printing of the receipt stamps. He was at a loss to understand the vote of £8,000 for a stamp for newspapers, and thought the whole matter called for the investigation of a Committee.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the question which the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Whiteside) had raised seemed to divide itself under three heads, the first of which had relation to the remuneration allowed to Mr. Archer for his patent. Now the explanation which his hon. Friend (Mr. Wilson) had given was perfectly conclusive upon that part of the question. The negotiations with Mr. Archer were spread over a considerable number of years, and he himself, when Secretary to the Treasury, had communicated to that gentleman the offer of what was deemed by the then Government an adequate price for his patent, which certainly showed some ingenuity; nevertheless, in the execution of the idea, Mr. Archer, not having sufficient knowledge of mechanics, was greatly assisted by a gentleman in one of the public offices, who enabled him to carry out his views more effectually. How, therefore, they could think of appointing a Committee, with a view of handing over a sum of £6,000 or £8,000, or whatever sum the liberality of Gentlemen opposite might fix upon, surpassed his comprehension to conceive. He was of opinion that the money offered by the Government was a full equivalent for any claim Mr. Archer might have had upon the Government. That gentleman, however, refused to accept the offer; the question was therefore referred to a Select Committee. That Committee recommended a further negotiation with Mr. Archer, which was made, and which ended in an offer of the most liberal terms. Mr. Archer, with a full knowledge of all the circumstances, accepted that offer, without any reservation whatever. The money was paid and received; and he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) could not conceive what possible ground, at this distant period of time, there could be for reopening these transactions, or of inducing Mr. Archer to make any additional demand, on the ground that he had been underpaid. With regard to the contract with Messrs. Bacon and Petch, he had no very clear recollection of the proceedings in the year 1852-53; still the subject was investigated in that year. And the Committee concluded its Report with declaring that they were of opinion that in the renewal of the contract it was not necessary to make it for five years, as neither the interests nor convenience of the public were thereby secured. With respect to the question of surface printing and copper-plate printing, the question had been but recently investigated at the Treasury, in concert with scientific persons; and they were of opinion that, in order to secure the Treasury against forgery, it was desirable to have recourse to copper-plate in preference to surface printing. Another point adverted to had been the question with regard to the contract with Mr. Delarue as to surface printing, it being stated that the price at which the contract had been completed was excessive. Now, he had no knowledge upon the subject, not having heard the question raised before. He would, therefore, only content himself with saying that, nevertheless, he did not think they ought to delegate to Select Committees the duty of making Government contracts. He would cause the case to be investigated, and see whether there were any grounds for the statement of the hon. and learned Member.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

MR. WHITESIDE, in reply, said that the complaint amongst the trade was, that they never got the chance of offering for this contract; but that it was given by the Government to Mr. Delarue, because he was in some way connected with people in office. He therefore submitted that it was a clear case for a Committee, and he hoped that the House would declare it to be so.

MR. BELL said, that there was no explanation given of the £8,000.

MR. WILSON said, with regard to the claim for £500 which had been alluded to, if not an actual mortgage, it was considered by the solicitor to the Treasury a valid charge, and therefore one which it was necessary to take into account in purchasing the machine. The £8,000 included in the Votes of this year was for the introduction of adhesive stamps instead of impressed stamps for newspapers.

Motion made, and Question put—

“That a Select Committee be appointed, to inquire into the circumstances of the purchase of the Machine and Invention for perforating Postage Labels by the Government from Mr. Archer, the inventor; and also into the circumstances under which the existing agreements between the Government and the Contractors for gumming and printing the Postage and Receipt Labels were made.”

The House divided :—Ayes 39; Noes 57: Majority 18.

MR. BROTHERTON said, he should now move the adjournment of the House. It was nearly midnight; the House had only adjourned at two o'clock that morning, they had to meet at noon to-morrow, and he thought it only right that they should not proceed further with the business on the paper.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, there were some notices on the paper which might be disposed of without any discussion, and he hoped the hon. Gentleman would not press his Motion, on the understanding that only unopposed notices should be proceeded with.

MR. BROTHERTON said, on that condition he would withdraw his Motion.

FISHERIES (IRELAND).

MR. M'MAHON rose, to move for a Select Committee to investigate the operation of the recent Statutes relating to the Fisheries of Ireland.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, if the hon. and learned Gentleman persevered in going on with this Motion, he should accept the proposition for adjournment.

MR. BROTHERTON said, he must remind the House of the condition upon which he had just withdrawn his Motion.

MR. M'MAHON said that, as the Motion for adjournment had been withdrawn, and he was now in possession of the House, the hon. Gentleman was out of order in interrupting him.

MR. SPEAKER: The Motion for adjournment not having been pressed, the hon. and learned Gentleman has an abstract right to go on with his Motion, but I must remind him that that was not the understanding.

MR. M'MAHON said, he had not been a party to the arrangement, and must deny that he was bound by it. It was a very early hour for the transaction of Irish business in the House of Commons.

Notice taken, that Forty Members were not present; House counted; and Forty Members not being present, The House was adjourned at Twelve o'clock.

NAWAB OF SURAT TREATY BILL.

Upon the Order of the Day for the consideration of this Bill being read,

MR. VERNON SMITH said, he wished to suggest a postponement of the further consideration of the Bill for a week. The right hon. Gentleman the Speaker had decided that the subject was properly dealt with in a Private Bill, and it had been referred to a Select Committee, who had made their Report in a somewhat unusual shape, by calling the attention of the House to the reasons for their decision. Although the subject was treated of in a Private Bill, yet many points of a public nature were involved, as the Committee themselves had stated. Questions of constitutional principle would probably arise, and the whole subject would require most careful consideration. He therefore proposed that, as the Committee had made a special Report, the House should defer the further consideration for a week, in order that Members might make themselves fully acquainted with the evidence upon which the Report had been founded.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill, as amended in the Committee, be taken into further consideration upon Wednesday next."

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, that the question to be decided concerned the good faith and honour of this country. It was a solemn appeal for justice, and involved the character and good name of the nation. He could not consent to any postponement of the Bill, as he conceived such a course would very much endanger its success. The claim of the Nawab of Surat was for the payment of an annuity which the East India Company had solemnly pledged itself to pay to the descendants of a native prince, who, upon the faith of that engagement had ceded to the East India Company his territories and revenues, of which the Company were in possession up to that very period. Of the justice of the claim now made he had no doubt, and if the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. V. Smith) would pledge himself that, in the event of the decision of the Committee of that House being in favour of the claim, the East India Company should render a tardy justice and make payment of the annuity, he (Sir F. Kelly) would not resist a postponement of the consideration of the Bill. He was sorry to see that the right hon. Gentleman gave no assent to that proposition, and, therefore his only course was to proceed. It was now some fifty years since the Nawab of Surat (in part coerced by the presence of a large British force) reluctantly entered into a treaty with the East India Company for the cession of his territories, his army, and his little fleet to the Company, upon consideration of receiving an annual payment, at first, of 75,000 rupees and one-fifth part of certain revenues, and subsequently a total annual sum of 150,000 rupees to be settled upon himself and his heirs. The annuity had been regularly paid to the Nawab during his life, and afterwards to his son and successor. Upon the death of the latter, in 1843, the office of Nawab was claimed by Meer Jaffier Ali Khan, the husband of the only surviving daughter of the last Nawab. The Company, however, disputed his right to the title, and after many delays they determined, ex parte—for Jaffier Ali was denied the opportunity of being heard upon his claim—they determined, on the construction of the treaty, that by reason of the office of Nawab having ceased—which, be it observed, they had made to cease, and might have made to cease at any moment after the treaty was signed—the successors of the Nawab having come to an end, his heirs had no claim to the annuity. It was true the Company had allowed to some Members of the family of the late Nawab certain pensions during their lives; but they insisted that this was an act of generosity or charity, and repudiated the claim as one of law or justice. In order to obtain the decision of Parliament the case had been brought before the House, and it had been introduced in the shape of a Private Bill upon the authority of the right hon. Gentleman the Speaker. The object of the Bill was to declare, that by the terms of the treaty the heirs and descendants of the Nawab of Surat were now entitled to the annuity of 150,000 rupees a year as originally granted. The Select Committee to whom the Bill was referred, comprising the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxford (Mr. Cardwell), at once a statesman and a lawyer, his right hon. and learned Friend the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Napier), and the hon. and learned Member for Weymouth (Mr. G. Butt), with others of learning and eminence, unanimously pronounced their decision against the Company, and declared that according to the legal interpretation of the treaty the Indian Government was bound to pay the annuity to the heirs-descendants of the Nawab and his family for ever. And no one could doubt but that if language similar to that used by the Company on the occasion of the original treaty, was held by any Gentleman in that House, that he would be compelled by every court of law in the kingdom to act by the interpretation put upon this treaty by the Select Committee. The question, then, to be decided was, whether under the terms of the treaty the annuity should be paid only to the heirs and successors in the office of the Nawab of Surat, or to the heirs-descendants of that person. The Select Committee entertained no sort of doubt that, according to the just and equitable as well as legal meaning of the words in the treaty, the annuity was payable to the heirs of the Nawab in the ordinary, natural, and legal meaning of that term—the heirs of the family. The Committee had, indeed, in their Report stated that “questions of a public nature had been raised in the course of the inquiry,” but who had raised them? It was the

Sir Piercy Kelly

East India Company who had raised those questions, and created those difficulties, with the aid of the able counsel who appeared for them in the Committee. It was said that there was a constitutional question involved, but he had yet to learn that there was anything in the constitution of British India which could release the East India Company from the performance of a solemn obligation? It must be remembered that the treaty had been almost forced upon an unwilling prince, who, upon acceding to it, handed over all his possessions, his power, and authority to the East India Company, and who did so with a firm belief in the good faith of those with whom he was dealing. The legal construction of the treaty, then, was in favour of the claim; and if the surrounding circumstances of the case were next considered, all doubt must be at an end; for it was expressly declared and represented to the Nawab by Governor Duncan, who negotiated the treaty, “that it would give security for an honourable provision to his master and his family and his descendants from generation to generation, greater than he had ever yet had; and as the Company had never failed in a strict performance of their engagements, would bind them in perpetuity to the support of the Nawab and his family.” Such being the language of the Governor of Bombay, he could not understand how this claim could be resisted. If it were said that an Address to the Crown was the proper mode of obtaining justice, his reply was that, supposing the Government prepared to advise the Crown to order payment they need only say so, and he would no longer occupy the time of the House. If the House should sanction the Report, as he confidently expected, it would be found that precedent and authority were likewise in favour of the claim. Thirty years ago the then Zemindar of Nozeed obtained a large loan of money by a Mr. Hodges, an English gentleman; that money was advanced upon the security of certain villages belonging to the Zemindar, and the guarantee was recognised by the East India Company. Subsequently, however, the territory of Nozeed was attached to the dependencies of the Company, and they refused to compensate Mr. Hodges for his advances to the Zemindar. On that Mr. Hodges appealed to Parliament, and a Private Bill was introduced, which passed through both Houses, and the Company was compelled to make good the claim of Mr. Hodges. Another provision of this Bill related to the private estates of the late Nawab. The claims of the family of the Nawab of Surat were referred to a Mr. Freer, who made an award; and, subsequently, an Act of the Government of India assumed to dispose of those conflicting claims. That Act was most unconstitutional, because it took away the right of appeal to Her Majesty in Council, which was the birthright of every subject in India; and he was at first disposed to bring in a Bill to declare it void; but all he asked now, was to give back the right of appeal. He thanked the House for the attention with which they had listened to his statement, and he appealed to their sense of honour, of truth, and of good faith to deal justly with this matter. He understood, as a point of form, the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman was, "that this Bill, as amended, be further considered on this day week," as an Amendment to which he would move to leave out all the words after the word "Bill," and to add these words, "be now read a third time."

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "Bill" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words, "be read the third time," instead thereof.

SIR JAMES HOGG said, he could not understand how, if the hon. and learned Gentleman (Sir F. Kelly) relied so confidently on the justice of the case, he should persist in seeking a decision, when no single Member had had an opportunity of informing himself as to the merits or facts of the question. The House ought to know that the merits had not been reported upon by the Committee. They were of opinion, in common with himself, that questions of State policy should be left to the Executive, and to the Executive alone; and, whatever might be the determination, it should be borne in mind that the parties were not helpless. If the Executive did not do their duty, or had acted improperly, an Address to the Crown might be moved, or reference made to a Select Committee. There were many ways of raising discussions on a public question, but of all ways the most reprehensible and the most opposed to justice was to refer to a private Committee; and, if proof were required, it was only necessary to quote the concluding sentence of the Report of this private Committee. They said:—

"Into other considerations of a political and constitutional nature your Committee have declined to enter. What degree of weight these considerations may bear your Committee have regarded as a question properly belonging to the House itself."

And so he regarded it, and therefore he was not prepared for a discussion of the construction of a treaty which was essentially a constitutional question, in the absence of all knowledge of the case. He was afraid that the object was to raise a prejudice against the East India Company. Besides, it was not a subject upon which loss of time was important, for he found in the paper last Session these notices:—

"Nawab of Surat.—Sir F. Kelly,—A Bill to repeal so much of the Act of 1848 which takes away the jurisdiction of the Courts of Law."

"Sir Esakine Perry,—To call the attention of the House to the treaty between the East India Company and the Nawab of Surat, and the interpretation put upon the treaty by the Company."

Why did not the hon. and learned Member for Devonport call attention to the treaty and its construction? The House would then have had papers before it, and escaped the gross delusions which pervaded the statement of the hon. and learned Member for East Suffolk (Sir F. Kelly). The hon. and learned Gentleman said this unfortunate Prince, as he called him, had transferred to the Company the territories and revenues of Surat. He denied it. He was not going into a long history about Surat, but he would mention a few leading points which he begged the House to keep in mind, in order to come to a clear understanding of the question. The East India Company had had commercial relations with Surat as long ago as 1667, but nothing of consequence occurred until political relations existed, which dated back to 1759. Previous to that date the chief of that city and its dependencies had committed great acts of injustice on British subjects, and refused redress. In consequence of that refusal, the Government of the day combined with an individual named Meerjan, and expelled the chief who had previously ruled over Surat, and the result of the engagement with Meerjan was, that he took the territory and revenue, while we took the Mogul castle and fleet. The treaty with Meerjan was a personal treaty, and not a treaty with him and his successors, and on his death it was fully competent for the East India Company to bestow the town and territory of Surat upon any other individual. Meerjan died in 1789, and upon his death, and upon the death of each of his successors, the names and claims of competitors for the chief authority were sent to the English authorities, and, after discussion, the person deemed the fittest succeeded by the nomination of the Government of India, and certainly not by descent. In 1790, so completely was Surat considered within the control of the Government of India that the Governor of Bombay wrote to Lord Cornwallis expressing an opinion that, as the Indian Government had to pay for external defence and internal Government, it was better to do away with the mere form of authority in the Nawab. At that time the Mahratta power had a claim of "chout" upon the Surat territory, and, in terror of a conflict with the Mahratta power, Lord Cornwallis said he would not accede to the recommendation of the Bombay Government, but would allow the son of the ruler, who was dead, to succeed to the Nawabship. He now came to the year 1800, the date of the treaty. He did not want to urge the House to be bound by the words of the treaty; but in construing it, the first consideration should be the circumstances of the case, and the position of the parties at the time; the next should be the policy of the Government, the object which they had in view, and the means which they took for effecting that object; and the last should be, what was said and done by the actors and persons engaged in the treaty at the time. While the chiefs of Surat had possession, there were constant quarrels with the Company. The Company wanted them to pay something for defence and government. The chiefs pretended poverty, and would pay nothing. Those disputes were pending when, in 1800, the Nawab died. Lord Wellesley, who was then Governor General, said, "Now is the opportunity to place the government of Surat on a solid and proper footing." The hon. and learned Gentleman (Sir F. Kelly) said, "The object of the Government of that day was to purchase from the son of the deceased Nawab a transfer of his territory and revenue, and to pay for it." He (Sir J. Hogg) had previously shown that there was no succession in the family—no right of inheritance—and every word of a letter of Lord Wellesley, who made the treaty, gave an utter contradiction to the statement of the hon. and learned Gentleman. In that letter Lord Wellesley said:—

Sir James Hogg

"The exigencies of the public service during the late war in Mysore, and the negotiations which succeeded the termination of it, would have rendered it impracticable to your Government to furnish the military force necessary for effecting reform in the government of Surat, even if other considerations had not rendered it advisable to defer that reform until the complete establishment of tranquillity throughout India."

Lord Wellesley distinctly stated that the East India Government were competent to do what they liked with the Nawabship and to give it to whom they pleased, and when he sent the articles of agreement to the Nawab he caused him to be explicitly told that his acquiescence in the articles was the condition on which he was to succeed to the Nawabship. The hon. and learned Gentleman (Sir F. Kelly) spoke from his brief, and he only knew as much of the case as it was the interest of the parties to tell him, but he could not know anything of this letter of Lord Wellesley, which was the very essence of the case. Lord Wellesley expressly said that the provision made for the Nawab was not a provision for the individual and his family, but for the maintenance of the State and office of the Nawab. Lord Wellesley added that if the Nawab chose to ratify the articles he was to be placed in the situation of Nawab, and if he refused to do so, the Government would nominate some one else to the office. He had thus shown what were the views of the Government and of Lord Wellesley the Governor General of India, and he now came to the treaty itself, which was strictly in consonance with the letter of Lord Wellesley. He therefore objected altogether to the assumption that the hon. and learned Gentleman was one whit more anxious to do justice than those whose duty it was to administer the government of India. Lord Ellenborough, Lord Hardinge, and Lord Dalhousie were quite as desirous to do justice in this matter as the hon. and learned Gentleman, and they and three successive Presidents of the Board of Control had always taken that view which the hon. and learned Gentleman had discovered to be a gross injustice. The title of the agreement with the Nawab was as follows—

"Articles of Agreement between the East India Company and the Nawab of Surat, his Heirs and Successors, for the Administration of the Government of the city of Surat and its Dependencies."

The preamble set forth that the East India Company had been subjected to heavy expenses for the protection of Surat, and that the existing system of government was inadequate for the protection of life and property. That, he contended, bore out the construction that the agreement was one between the East India Company and the Nawab and his heirs, being Nawabs. The article on which the hon. and learned Gentleman relied was that in which the East India Company agreed to pay the Nawab and his heirs and successors a certain sum out of the revenues of Surat. The East India Company contended that that article applied to his heirs and successors, being Nawabs; and that whenever the Nawab was mentioned it indicated the office, and not the rights of individuals. He was sorry to trouble the House at such length, but he felt he had an uphill case. [Mr. MURDOCH. Hear, hear!] Yes, he could tell the hon. Member that he had an uphill case, when men by their cheers indicated that they had formed an opinion upon a case of the merits of which they must of necessity be ignorant, and before they had the means of knowing whether their opinion was well or ill-founded. A discussion subsequently arose between the Bombay Government and the Supreme Government whether or not they would allow the Nawabship to go to a collateral heir. A person called the Bukshee would in that case have been Nawab; and, if so, this man and his daughters would not have got one shilling. The hon. and learned Gentleman admitted that the Nawabship was gone, but yet he contended that the sum of 150,000 rupees a year should go to the heirs natural of the last Nawab. There was not a syllable in the treaty to show that it was ever intended to limit either the Nawabship or the annuity to the heirs natural of the person with whom the treaty was made. It was said that this man had been deceived, but what Mr. Duncan said to him was, that those who preceded him had only a personal right and had succeeded by the nomination of the Government of India, but that by the treaty in question the Nawab and his family would succeed by the right of succession. Mr. Duncan used the words, "heir" and "family," and the hon. and learned Gentleman contended that these words would not have been used if it had not been intended that his descendants and family, whether they succeeded or not to the Nawabship, would get the rupees.

His (Sir J. Hogg's) version, on the contrary, of what Mr. Duncan said was, that whereas the Nawab had up to that time only succeeded by nomination, by the treaty the Nawabship would be secured in the family; and with the Nawabship would be secured the rupees. Meer Jaffier Ali Khan in his memorial to the Court of Directors, in February, 1844, at first claimed as successor to the Nawab; but when both the Government of India and the Court of Directors told him it was impossible to recognise his claim as successor, because the Nawabship had lapsed, he shifted his ground and said that the annuity had been granted in perpetuity, was private property, and was given irrespective of, and unconnected with the Nawabship. Yet this was the person who only a few months before had preferred his claim to the succession. One of the grounds upon which he founded his claim to the Nawabship was the assurance which, as he stated, he had received from his father-in-law. Now, a treaty had been set on foot between the Nawab of Baroda and the late Nawab of Surat with regard to the marriage of the daughters of the latter with the sons of the former, and an arrangement having been made that the stipend and the Nawabships of Surat should go to the sons of the Nawab of Baroda, the two Nawabs wrote and asked the Government of India to ratify that arrangement. The Government refused its assent, but the fact of its having been demanded proved that the parties thought they had themselves no right to enter into it. Upon every occasion the Government had exercised a control over the stipend, and at the time of the marriage of the two daughters of the late Nawab the husband must have been perfectly well aware that he was not entitled to a farthing. But did the House suppose that when the grant ceased the family of the Nawab would be left to want, or even that they would be in straitened circumstances? No such thing. A calculation had been made of the amount necessary to keep up the State of Nawab; that amount—£4,000—had been deducted from the stipend of 150,000 rupees—£15,000—and the remaining £11,000 had been divided among the family, not, he admitted, as a matter of right, but as a matter of grace and favour. Now, he could inform the House that that very claimant, although not entitled, either by the English or the Mahomedan law, to a single farthing, received

£2,400 a year from the liberality of the Government. He found that the title of the Bill had been changed. It was called the "Nawab of Surat Treaty Bill," instead of the "Nawab of Surat Bill." Probably the hon. and learned Gentleman thought the House would be alarmed at seeing a Bill introduced for the purpose of enforcing rights claimed under a treaty. It was his opinion that a treaty entered into by the Government of India was as binding upon the Government of England and upon the Crown as the treaty which had lately been signed at Paris, and the House would have cause to repent the establishment of a precedent by which individuals who fancied they had rights under treaties would be enabled to come to that House and attempt to enforce those rights. Now, what he would ask the House was, what was the definition of a private Bill? It was a Bill which affected two or three people, not the whole community, and the result would be most calamitous if private Bills were allowed to deal with matters in which important questions of public policy, like the present question, were involved. Why had not the hon. and learned Gentleman, instead of introducing a private Bill, moved for a Committee or an Address to the Crown? He now came to a question totally unconnected with that which he had hitherto been discussing. The petitioner (Meer Jaffer Ali Khan) dwelt very little at first upon the question of the treaty, but said, "When the Nawab died you took possession of the Government, and you brought in a Bill to screen yourselves, to withdraw the question from the jurisdiction of the ordinary Courts, and to take away my right of appeal." That was certainly an astounding statement to those who were not acquainted with India, but those who were acquainted with that country knew that the greatest honour which could be conferred on a native was to exempt him from the jurisdiction of the ordinary Courts. He held in his hand a list of 288, not princes, but sirdars, in the Bombay territory alone, who had a right to that exemption. The list was divided into three classes, and the greatest injury that could be inflicted upon a man in No. 1 class was to put him into No. 2, and upon a man in No. 2, to put him into No. 3. At the death of the Nawab the Government had nothing to do but to see that the estate went to the rightful heirs, and a Bill was passed; not to withdraw it from the ordinary tribunals, but to constitute a tribunal for the adjudication of conflicting rights. When the Bill was published, Meer Jaffer Ali Khan thought it was not extensive enough, and he actually prepared an additional clause, distinctly exempting himself, his family, and the estate from the jurisdiction of the ordinary tribunals. Yet this much-injured man now ventured to complain of having been withdrawn from their jurisdiction and deprived of his appeal to the Queen in Council, having himself been not only a consenting, but even a soliciting, party to that withdrawal. There was another important point to which he desired to call the attention of the House. He contended that this was a question of public policy which ought to be determined by the Executive, and could not be brought under the consideration of any Court of justice; but if he were wrong in that argument—if the question were one for a judicial tribunal, why had not the petitioner taken it before the judicial tribunals of India, from whose decision, if it were unsatisfactory, he might have appealed to the Queen in Council? Although the petitioner was exempt from the jurisdiction of the ordinary tribunals, the Government and the Company were not; he could not be sued, but he could sue them in every Court in India. Why did he not take that course? Why, because he never thought of insisting on the rights he now claimed until he came to England. But he (Sir J. Hogg) warned the House that if they taught the natives of India to look for the redress of their grievances, not to the local authorities, but to the English Parliament, they would entirely destroy the influence of the Government of India; and they would transfer "khadput"—not corruption, but, what was still worse, undue influence—which they had banished from Baroda and Bombay, to England. He was very much astonished that no papers were laid before the House previous to the introduction of the Bill; but, a few days before a discussion upon it was likely to take place, his hon. and learned Friend behind him (Sir E. Perry) had supplied the omission, and the production he now held in his hand had been brought under their notice by the petitioner, who had the hardihood to style himself a descendant of the Mogul, a statement which was absurd, because it was not true. Now, the reason why the Nawab had consented to the marriage of his daughter with Meer Jaffer Ali Khan was, that there was a doubt as to the legitimacy of their mother. It was in consequence of that stigma upon the family that he put up with the low-born Meer Jaffier Ali Khan. Sir George Clerk stated that there were great doubts as to the marriage of the mother of the girls, but there was no doubt that they were born four years previous to the ceremony, even if it had taken place. Sir George Clerk also said that the connection was far below the rank of the Nawab, since Meer Jaffier Ali Khan was of no family whatever, having been the architect of his own fortunes. ["Hear, hear!"] He had not a word to say against a man because he had been the architect of his own fortunes; still, under those circumstances, he had no right to boast that he was a descendant of the Moguls. Sir George Clerk further stated that the Nawab had consented to his daughter's marriage with Meer Jaffier Ali Khan, in consequence of the doubt as to her legitimacy, and that, in his opinion, Meer Jaffier Ali Khan had been most liberally dealt with by the Government. Mr. Willoughby also concurred in the opinion of Sir George Clerk. In the private estate of the Nawab the Home Government had no interest, and he wished that that had gone before the Queen in Council, because it was a matter of judicial decision; but the construction of treaties and questions of State policy were not matters which could be submitted to any judicial tribunal. He therefore hoped the House was prepared to accede to the Motion of his right hon. Friend (Mr. V. Smith) for the adjournment of the consideration of the Bill. Before sitting down he would beg to correct an error he had fallen into in the course of his speech. He found that the petitioner Meer Jaffier Ali Khan described himself, not as descended from the Moguls, but from a nobleman in their Court.

Sir James Hogg

Mr. CARDWELL said, he felt sure that the House was desirous of dealing with this great question in a judicial spirit, and of giving a just and equitable decision, so that justice might not be defeated either by delay or by the absence of any knowledge which it was desirable to possess. Viewing the matter in that light, he regarded it as rather inconvenient that the House was at that moment discussing the great merits of the question on a motion for delay, and consequently giving it a partial and incomplete consideration. The House should determine at once whether it would go into the question that day or on next Wednesday with the evidence before it. He had acted on the Private Bill Committee on this measure with colleagues unanimous in their decision, and, as far as they were concerned, it would be agreeable to them that the House should be in possession before coming to a vote, of the grounds on which the Committee decided. He would explain to the House how the Committee regarded the nature of their duty. Finding that the subject-matter in dispute was of a public, and not private nature, they felt that the attention of the House must be called in a formal and solemn manner to the real merits of the controversy. In the first place, acting as a Private Bill Committee, they dealt with the treaty of 1800 according to its construction as a written document, and according to the representations which appeared to have been made at the time it was signed and executed, the Committee unanimously arrived at the conclusion that if the agreement had been made between private parties it ought to have force and validity, and consequently they so reported the Bill to the House. Then came the other question which the Committee had defined in their Report to be of a constitutional or political character. The constitutional question was this:—The charge, if enacted by Parliament, would be a charge upon the public revenues of India. A Bill treating a charge on the revenues of this country could not come before the House in the shape of the present Bill, it being a fixed rule of the House that no such Bill could make any step without a recommendation from the Crown. There was, however, no Standing Order applicable to charges on the revenues of India; but the Committee, sitting as a Private Bill Committee, did not think they could come to any decision on that point, which, if noticed at all, ought, they considered, to be noticed by the House itself. They also came to the same conclusion in reference to any public considerations connected with the treaty. He would now venture to state the course which he thought it would be convenient for the House to take. It had been justly said that this was a question in which the honour of the British name and the honour of the British Crown were concerned—and he thought the House should first hear from the constituted authorities, the responsible Ministers of the Crown, what was the course which they, taking a wide and comprehensive view of the subject, were prepared to take in regard to the stipulations of the treaty, and then the House would be able to judge whether their view was a right and equitable one, and such as they ought to sanction. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Control had moved the adjournment of the consideration of the Bill till Wednesday next; and he understood that the hon. and learned Member for East Suffolk (Sir F. Kelly) was willing to assent to that arrangement if he could be assured that a decision would be come to next Wednesday, that that decision should be taken to be final, and that, in case it was in favour of the Bill, the money would be paid. It was not for him to enter into that part of the case, but a reasonable course appeared to be this—that the President of the Board of Control should couple the proposition for the adjournment of the debate until next Wednesday with a promise that he would then be prepared to explain the views and intentions of the Government in regard to the treaty of 1800; and also with an assurance that the Bill should not be defeated by being delayed too late to receive a second reading in the Lords according to the Orders of that House.

MR. VERNON SMITH said, he could assure the House that he had moved the adjournment of the debate not to defeat the Bill by delay, but because he thought it behoved the House, for the sake of its dignity, if not for the sake of decency, after having referred the Bill to a Committee, to know on what grounds that Committee had come to a decision. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxford had asked whether the money would be paid, supposing the next stage of the Bill should be carried. That matter was not in the hands of the Executive, for they could not dictate what course the House of Lords should adopt with regard to the Bill; but he believed that, if the present debate were adjourned till Wednesday next, there would be no risk of the Bill being prevented passing both branches of the Legislature by mere delay.

MR. CARDWELL said, he must beg to explain that nothing was further from his intention than to imply that the right hon. Gentleman wished to defeat the Bill by delay.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he wished to have an assurance that the evidence would be printed by next Wednesday, so that there might be no further delay on that ground.

Mr. Cardwell

SIR ERSKINE PERRY said, that the main question was the validity of the treaty of 1800. Now, all the evidence on that subject was already on the table of the House. If the collateral evidence were to be printed, it could not be got ready in time. Meer Jaffier Ali Khan had been for three years endeavouring to bring the matter to an issue. The East India Company was bound to do him justice, and it was not because political questions were mixed up with the question of justice that justice was not to be rendered to him. He (Sir E. Perry) asked for an assurance that, at all events, the question would come on on Wednesday next. Delay in a case between a powerful Government and an individual implied defeat. If the matter were left to next Session it would amount to a refusal to decide it. As to the conclusions of the hon. Member for Honiton (Sir J. Hogg) he dissented from them from first to last, and should be ready to prove every one of the facts on which he founded them to be unfounded. It was taking the mere gossip of the country and founding grave proceedings upon it. One statement of the hon. Member was, that Meer Jaffier Ali Khan, the petitioner, was a man of humble origin, who had married a rich wife. Now, the fact was, that he was of the same family, that of the Nawab of Baroda, with which he intermarried. The East India Company itself had admitted the legitimacy of the present petitioner, which the Member had questioned. The hon. Member had also stated that the appointment to the Nawabship of Surat had been made in 1759 by the East India Company. The fact was, that it had been independent for a long time previously; but in 1800, the East India Company, for their own purpose, chose to deprive the then holder of his office. The Nawab signed a treaty in ignorance of its meaning, and under a deceptive notion of English law. He thought he had said enough to show that the opinion of the hon. Member for Honiton was unfounded, which he did not attribute to intention, but to his sanguine temperament, which led him to take everything according to his own views. He trusted that a full assurance would be given that the question would be finally settled on Wednesday.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he was not aware that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. V. Smith) was not as well able to express his views and those of the Government on the mere question of the construclegitimacy of their mother. It was in consequence of that stigma upon the family that he put up with the low-born Meer Jaffer Ali Khan. Sir George Clerk stated that there were great doubts as to the marriage of the mother of the girls, but there was no doubt that they were born four years previous to the ceremony, even if it had taken place. Sir George Clerk also said that the connection was far below the rank of the Nawab, since Meer Jaffer Ali Khan was of no family whatever, having been the architect of his own fortunes. ["Hear, hear!"] He had not a word to say against a man because he had been the architect of his own fortunes; still, under those circumstances, he had no right to boast that he was a descendant of the Moguls. Sir George Clerk further stated that the Nawab had consented to his daughter's marriage with Meer Jaffer Ali Khan, in consequence of the doubt as to her legitimacy, and that, in his opinion, Meer Jaffer Ali Khan had been most liberally dealt with by the Government. Mr. Willoughby also concurred in the opinion of Sir George Clerk. In the private estate of the Nawab the home Government had no interest, and he wished that that had gone before the Queen in Council, because it was a matter of judicial decision; but the construction of treaties and questions of State policy were not matters which could be submitted to any judicial tribunal. He therefore hoped the House was prepared to accede to the Motion of his right hon. Friend (Mr. V. Smith) for the adjournment of the consideration of the Bill. Before sitting down he would beg to correct an error he had fallen into in the course of his speech. He found that the petitioner Meer Jaffer Ali Khan described himself, not as descended from the Moguls, but from a nobleman in their Court.

Mr. CARDWELL said, he felt sure that the House was desirous of dealing with this great question in a judicial spirit, and of giving a just and equitable decision, so that justice might not be defeated either by delay or by the absence of any knowledge which it was desirable to possess. Viewing the matter in that light, he regarded it as rather inconvenient that the House was at that moment discussing the great merits of the question on a motion for delay, and consequently giving it a partial and incomplete consideration. The House should determine at once whether it would go into the question that day or on next Wednesday with the evidence before it. He had acted on the Private Bill Committee on this measure with colleagues unanimous in their decision, and, as far as they were concerned, it would be agreeable to them that the House should be in possession before coming to a vote, of the grounds on which the Committee decided. He would explain to the House how the Committee regarded the nature of their duty. Finding that the subject-matter in dispute was of a public, and not private nature; they felt that the attention of the House must be called in a formal and solemn manner to the real merits of the controversy. In the first place, acting as a Private Bill Committee, they dealt with the treaty of 1800 according to its construction as a written document, and according to the representations which appeared to have been made at the time it was signed and executed, the Committee unanimously arrived at the conclusion that if the agreement had been made between private parties it ought to have force and validity, and consequently they so reported the Bill to the House. Then came the other question which the Committee had defined in their Report to be of a constitutional or political character. The constitutional question was this:—The charge, if enacted by Parliament, would be a charge upon the public revenues of India. A Bill creating a charge on the revenues of this country could not come before the House in the shape of the present Bill, it being a fixed rule of the House that no such Bill could make any step without a recommendation from the Crown. There was, however, no Standing Order applicable to charges on the revenues of India; but the Committee, sitting as a Private Bill Committee, did not think they could come to any decision on that point, which, if noticed at all, ought, they considered, to be noticed by the House itself. They also came to the same conclusion in reference to any public considerations connected with the treaty. He would now venture to state the course which he thought it would be convenient for the House to take. It had been justly said that this was a question in which the honour of the British name and the honour of the British Crown were concerned—and he thought the House should first hear from the constituted authorities, the responsible Ministers of the Crown, what was the course which they, taking a wide and comprehensive view of the subject, were prepared to take in in possession of that dignity. That was assuredly a pettifogging mode of procedure which the House ought not to tolerate.

SIR JOHN FITZGERALD said, that every appeal to that House ought to be most carefully listened to, and it was a denial of justice to delay granting redress to an act of the most flagrant tyranny on the part of the Bombay Government. The East India Company had granted an annuity, and then taken it away on false pretences, and it was for redress against such a proceeding that the petitioner appealed to that House.

MR. SPOONER said, that the House, according to the terms of the Report itself, was bound to accede to the Motion of the hon. and learned Member for East Suffolk. What constitutional question, he would like to know, could stop the obligation of fulfilling the express terms of a treaty? The language was perfectly clear; and the Committee had declared that it could come to no other conclusion than that on which it had framed this Bill. He denied, therefore, that there was any necessity for waiting to read the evidence. He heard with great reluctance the proposal to postpone the consideration of the matter.

MR. OTWAY said, he could not see that there would be any disposition on the part of the Government to delay the Bill beyond Wednesday, and if they did, the House, he trusted, would not allow it. He thought, therefore, that the hon. and learned Gentleman (Sir F. Kelly) ought to withdraw his Amendment. As to any information the House would get in the meantime, he did not believe the House could possibly be put in possession of any facts to influence its judgment; but as the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Control had said that on that day he should be prepared to state the views of the Government, he thought that the most judicious course for them to adopt would be to wait till that day.

MR. JOHN MACGREGOR said, that there had been frequent movements in the country to put down the Board of Control, which often interfered most improperly with the functions of the East India Company. The treaty that had been so often mentioned in the course of the discussion had been made in 1800, and was one of the greatest frauds that had ever been perpetrated. He concurred in all that had fallen from the hon. and learned

Members for Devonport and East Suffolk. He thought the speech of the hon. Member for Heniton (Sir J. Hogg) utterly unfounded. All the clamour that had been raised was raised by interested persons to attack the conduct of the East India Company, when the real fault, he believed, lay with the Board of Control.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, the only object of the adjournment was to enable the House to see the evidence, which he understood from Mr. Speaker would be ready in one or two days. It was not to suit the convenience of the President of the Board of Control, for though he had abstained to-day from going into the merits of the case, he was perfectly well acquainted with them, and had already formed a judgment on the matter. As to the resumption of the debate on Wednesday next, that, of course, would depend on the House. No opposition would be offered by the Government to the question being brought forward on that day, and the Government would be prepared then to state their view of the subject. In the absence, however, of the evidence, which was necessary to enable the House to form an opinion on so very important a question, he considered that it would be unwise to proceed to a division that day.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, that as it was the intention of Her Majesty's Government to state their opinion on Wednesday on this question, and the evidence would be so soon in the hands of Members, he would consent to the postponement of the question until Wednesday next.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill, as amended in the Committee, to be taken into further consideration upon Wednesday next.

EARL OF PERTH AND MELFORT'S COMPENSATION.

MR. FITZROY brought up the Report.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he wished to be informed what amount of money was involved in the grant proposed to be made under the Bill.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, the step now taken was merely to authorise the bringing in of a Bill. Full explanations would be given when the Bill was brought in.

COLONEL FRENCH said, that if the principle was admitted, it should also be extended to England and Ireland.

tion of the treaty now, as he could be at any future period; and, as he did not understand the right hon. Gentleman to give any pledge, that in the event of the debate being adjourned to Wednesday next, it would be finally dealt with by the Government, then he had no other course to adopt than to press the Bill through its present stage.

MR. WIGRAM said, he thought that the question could not be decided in the absence of the evidence, and if the Motion was pressed to a division he should vote with the Government. As to the merits of the case, it was only a Private Bill in form, but public in reality, as dealing with public revenues and repealing a public legislative Act. The Bill ought, he was of opinion, to have been so framed as that the doubtful question of the annuity, as to whether it was granted to the Nawab and his successors in office, or to the Nawab and his heirs simply, should be left open, so as to be decided hereafter. Whatever the East India Company might do, the real responsibility ought to rest with the Board of Control. For that reason, he thought that the first provisions of the Bill were unsatisfactory, as referring everything to the Board of Control. The second clause was equally unsatisfactory, as dealing with a matter which ought only to be settled by the family of the Nawab, as referring to the manner in which his estate ought to be divided, on the merits.

SIR JAMES GRAHAM said, he should support the Motion for adjournment, not thinking that the House was at present competent to arrive at any satisfactory decision on the merits of the case. The House had before them the Report of a most competent Committee, which had given its opinion on the merits of the case, as between the two parties, intimating however, at the same time, that there was a further and most important question—a political and constitutional question—to be taken into consideration, which they did not conceive to have been referred to them, or, at all events, which they had not felt it their duty to report upon. Upon this question it was of the last importance that the House should hear the opinion of Her Majesty's Government, as represented by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Control. He understood the right hon. Gentleman to have stated to the House that he should be prepared to give that opinion on Wednesday next, and that in all probability, before Wednesday next, the evidence which was the groundwork of the opinion to be formed by the right hon. Gentleman and the House, as to the higher question of the political and constitutional bearing of the matter, would be in the hands of Members. That evidence, he was told, was voluminous; but, looking at the late period of the Session, it would be a substantial denial of justice if, on account of its late production or its bulk, the decision of the House were postponed beyond Wednesday next. If the President of the Board of Control would assure the House that he would, at all events, be prepared to pronounce an opinion on Wednesday next, and that in the meantime every exertion should be used to place the evidence in the hands of Members, it would be unwise at the present time to proceed to a division and to carry the present discussion further, therefore, in his opinion, was inexpedient and unnecessary.

MR. VERNON SMITH said, his sole reason for desiring an adjournment was the absence of the evidence on which the decision of the House must rest; but he was informed by Mr. Speaker that the evidence would be ready in a very few days. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Carlisle (Sir J. Graham) had asked whether he should be prepared on Wednesday next to state the course which the Government intended to take with respect to this matter, even if the evidence were not printed; but that would be a question, not for him, but for the House to decide. If the House should next Wednesday be determined to proceed to a division, even without the evidence, of course he should then be prepared to state the view which the Government took on the subject.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, if the right hon. Gentleman would assure him that he would be ready to proceed next Wednesday, with or without the evidence, he would agree to the adjournment; otherwise he should take a division that day.

MR. J. G. PHILLIMORE said, he must deny that the political consideration ought to interfere with what was clearly justice. An annuity had been granted by the East India Company to the family of the petitioner, which the Company had now taken away from the petitioner, on the bare pretence that he was not longer a Nawab, and that the annuity was only granted to the family while it continued in possession of that dignity. That was assuredly a pettifogging mode of procedure which the House ought not to tolerate.

SIR JOHN FITZGERALD said, that every appeal to that House ought to be most carefully listened to, and it was a denial of justice to delay granting redress to an act of the most flagrant tyranny on the part of the Bombay Government. The East India Company had granted an annuity, and then taken it away on false pretences, and it was for redress against such a proceeding that the petitioner appealed to that House.

EARL OF PERTH AND MELFORT'S COMPENSATION.

MR. FITZROY brought up the Report.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he wished to be informed what amount of money was involved in the grant proposed to be made under the Bill.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, the step now taken was merely to authorise the bringing in of a Bill. Full explanations would be given when the Bill was brought in.

COLONEL FRENCH said, that if the principle was admitted, it should also be extended to England and Ireland.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that giving leave to introduce the Bill would not pledge the House to its support. In assenting to the petition, his noble Friend (Lord Palmerston) had reserved the right of the Government to oppose the Bill, if they should see fit.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he must complain that the House was, by this proceeding, called upon to take a step in the dark, and he thought the House ought to have some explanation before being called upon to affirm the principle.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, that although the measure was brought in as a private Bill, it partook very much of the nature of a public Bill; and, perhaps, although it was not usual in private Bills, it would be as well that some explanation should be given, at that stage, of its purport.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, that having charge of the Bill, he would beg to explain that the ancestor of the present Earl of Perth, in the reign of James II., was attainted of high treason and executed, his estates and property at the same time being forfeited to the Crown. His wife, however, who was ignorant of his supposed treasonable transactions, was possessed of private property in her own right, and this property was included by mistake in the confiscation, although she had committed no crime against the Crown. The descendants of the Earl and Countess had recently, within the last two or three years, in fact, secured the reversal of the attainder, and obtained the restoration of the title, and the object of the proposed Bill was to obtain some compensation from the hereditary revenues of Scotland for the private property of the countess, which had been improperly confiscated.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he thought that great care should be taken that the public revenues should not be voted away upon the application of private individuals, and the House should be cautious how it opened the door to claims of this description. He trusted that by the vote which the House now gave, it would not be prevented from bestowing most ample consideration on the measure on a future occasion.

MR. HENLEY said, he quite concurred with the right hon. Gentleman, that the utmost caution ought to be observed with regard to these Compensation Bills. Private Bills of that character ought not to be brought in at so late a period of the session, and perhaps it would be as well that some positive rule should be laid down for the future for regulating the introduction of these half private, half public Bills.

LORD HARRY VANE said, perhaps it would not be out of place if Mr. Speaker were to explain the existing mode of proceeding in introducing these double character Bills.

MR. SPEAKER said, in the first place, the promoters lodged a petition at the Private Bill Office, which was afterwards referred to the Standing Orders Committee to determine whether it was desirable that the Standing Orders should be dispensed with as had been done in the present instance. The Standing Orders being so suspended the petition for a Bill could still only be received by the House on the recommendation of the Crown, and when that recommendation was given, the petition was referred to a Committee of the whole House, because it related to the disposal of public money. That ordeal the present petition had already gone through, and the House was now asked to receive and adopt the Report which the Committee of the whole House had agreed to. Supposing the House to agree to the Motion, the Bill founded upon it would be introduced, and after the first reading it would be referred to the Examiner of Private Bills, to see if there were any Standing Orders, which it was necessary the promoters should have complied with. Everything being found to be in strict order, the Bill would be then read a second time as a Private Bill and referred, not to the ordinary Private Bill Committee, but to a distinct Select Committee. The Bill would then come back to the House in the shape of a Public Bill, when it would have to be referred to a Committee of the whole House, and in all its subsequent stages it would be treated in the same manner as though it were essentially a public measure.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he could express no opinion whether the Bill was founded in justice or not, as he was wholly uninformed as to the precise grounds of the claim the promoters asserted. No communication whatever had been made to the Treasury upon it, and under those circumstances perhaps it would not be unreasonable if he asked the hon. and learned Gentleman who had charge of the Bill to state now what were the materials upon which he proposed to ask the House to form a judgment in discussing the second reading of the Bill.

that great man, Mr. Dargan, he trusted that the House would permit the Bill to be read a second time; and at a future stage he would introduce Amendments that would do away with objections.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. J. D. FITZGERALD said, he wished to call special attention to the fact that one of the provisions of the Bill proposed to do away with the practice of registering licences, the fees from which produced £500 a year. He had not heard that the citizens of Dublin were willing to give up that amount. The other fee also went to relieve taxation, and was also to be abandoned. Then the Bill proceeded to deal, not only with retailers but with grocers, who might sell not less than two quarts, not to be consumed on the premises. It might be an important question as to placing grocers under the same provisions as other dealers, but that class of traders ought to be informed previously what was in contemplation. The other important alteration had reference to the hours at which public-houses should be kept open. It might, perhaps, be of benefit to alter the hours so as to make it lawful to keep open after nine on Sundays, but that could be hereafter considered. Then, with respect to altering the mode of granting licences, there were well-founded objections to the alteration proposed by the Bill, and as he could not recommend the House to agree to the second reading of the Bill, he should advise the hon. Member to withdraw his measure.

MR. BRADY said, he was not quite satisfied with the force of the objections of the right hon. and learned Gentleman.

MR. GROGAN said, he conceived that some extension of the hours during which public-houses in Dublin were permitted to be open was requisite for the convenience of trade, but the Bill was clogged with other provisions which he could not support.

MR. HORSMAN said, he would appeal to Mr. Speaker whether the alterations proposed to be effected in the Bill did not render its further prosecution irregular.

MR. SPEAKER said, that if the operation of the measure was to be limited to a particular locality the end in view must be attained by means of a private Bill.

MR. BRADY said, he would, under those circumstances, withdraw the Bill, trusting that the Government would see that the needful changes were made.

REFORMATORY AND INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS BILL.

LORD RAVENSWORTH moved, that the Committee (which stood appointed for this day) be put off to Tuesday next.

THE EARL OF CLANCARTY asked whether it was intended that the Bill should extend to Ireland.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL inquired whether the Bill was to embrace Scotland, as he feared that if it was, it would clash with the provisions of another measure, more especially as regarded the removal of children.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE said, that the Government ought to take a decided course with regard to these reformatory schools, which had been left too much, he thought, in the hands of private individuals. The Government ought to be prepared to deal with the important question of dealing with our juvenile criminal population. He much feared that the educating and clothing of young persons in these reformatories only offered a premium to a certain class of parents to induce their children to commit felonies, in order that they might receive eleemosynary assistance. The whole question was in an unsatisfactory state, and it had become a matter of great importance to determine how these schools—which ought to be prisons—should be conducted. Criminals, he maintained, ought to be dealt with by the Government of the country in which they committed their offences.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY said, the subject had not been overlooked by the Government, but the conclusion they had come to was, that this particular process of reforming juvenile offenders would be best intrusted to private hands. The influence exerted over such offenders must be the influence of kind hearts and of strong minds, and this sort of influence was difficult to be obtained through the medium of State machinery. Thirty or forty years ago this same method was, he believed, pursued with regard to refuges for the destitute. If the Government undertook the establishment of these reformatory institutions great difficulties, both religious and moral, at once started up. What, it would immediately be asked, was to be the religious training adopted? Was it to be the training of the Church of England? Such objections did not arise when these establishments were left to individual effort; and he thought, under all the circumstances, the Government had done wisely in declining to interfere by lifeless State machinery in a work which was at present being actively and heartily carried on throughout the whole country. As to the noble Earl's fears of danger to society from the establishment of reformatory institutions, which would to a certain extent tend to the encouragement of crime, that difficulty was met by a provision in the existing law, which enabled the magistrates, on committing a child to the reformatory, to charge the parent with payment of a sum for his maintenance. This provision could not be acted on in every case, but it was very generally carried into effect, and would exert, he believed, a wholesome influence upon parents.

LORD RAVENSWORTH said, the observations of his noble Friend and relative (the Earl of Hardwicke) seemed to be directed against the very principle of reformatory establishments rather than against any special provisions proposed for adoption. Now, whatever opinions might be formed with regard to these institutions, it was an undoubted fact that they formed a part and parcel of the institutions of the country at the present moment. There was hardly a populous district or a populous town in England which had not besieged the Home Office with deputations praying for the establishment of these schools, and no less than three Acts of Parliament now appeared on our Statute-book which were passed for the express purpose of regulating reformatories. It was therefore beside the question to protest against a principle which had already been adopted, was now in full operation, and the working of which could only be tested by experience. In answer to the noble Earl behind him (the Earl of Olanearthy) he begged to state that the Bill could not possibly be applied to Ireland, inasmuch as Ireland did not at present possess reformatory institutions. There was a measure upon the subject before the other House which was being met, however, with strenuous opposition. To a certain extent, the measure would be applicable to Scotland.

Motion agreed to; and the House ordered to be put into a Committee on Tuesday next.

House adjourned till To-morrow.

MESSAGE FROM THE QUEEN—THE SARDINIAN LOAN.

Message from HER MAJESTY brought up, and read by Mr. SPEAKER (all the Members being uncovered), as follows:—

“ VICTORIA R.

“ HER MAJESTY thinks it right to acquaint the House of Commons, that She has concluded a Convention with His Majesty the King of Sardinia, by which She has undertaken to recommend to Her Parliament to enable Her to advance, by way of Loan, to His Majesty the King of Sardinia, a sum of One Million Pounds sterling, contemplated by a Convention made between Her Majesty and His Majesty the King of Sardinia on the 26th January, 1855, in like manner, instalments, and proportions, and subject in all respects to the same conditions as if the late War had not been brought to a close at the expiration of twelve months from the payment of the first instalment of the sum of One Million Pounds sterling under the last-mentioned Convention.

“ The Government of His Majesty the King of Sardinia engages to accept the advance of this additional sum, on the same conditions in all respects, especially as to the calculation and payment of the interest, as if such advance had been made under the last-mentioned Convention.

“HER MAJESTY has directed a Copy of this Convention to be laid before the House of Commons, and She relies on the public spirit of the House of Commons for enabling Her to make good the engagement which She has contracted.

THE PAPER DUTY.—QUESTION.

MR. MILNER GIBSON wished to put a question to the hon. Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. G. A. Hamilton). The hon. Member and his right hon. Colleague had introduced a Bill, entitled “a Bill to repeal and amend certain laws and statutes relating to the University of Dublin.” In that Bill there was a clause by which the hon. Gentleman proposed to extend the exemption now allowed from the Excise duty charged on paper used in the printing of Bibles, Testaments, Psalm books, and books of Common Prayer to educational books used in the University of Dublin and printed at the University press. The extension of exemption from paper duty to educational works was a subject in which he had taken great interest. He was very glad to find that the hon. Members for the University of Dublin admitted by this proposal the important influence which the paper duty had in the checking diffusion of knowledge and preventing education. He wished therefore to ask the hon. Member whether this Bill was to be proceeded with, and when? And, further, he wished to ask whether the hon. Gentleman would communicate with his right hon. Colleague and consider the propriety of joining him in asking the Government to make a larger concession than the one he proposed, and extend the exemption from paper duty to educational works used not only in the University of Dublin, but generally throughout the country, and to school books.

MR. G. A. HAMILTON begged to state that the Bill in question had been prepared in conformity with the Report made by certain Commissioners who were appointed to inquire into the state of the University of Dublin, and who made their Report in the year 1853; the Archbishop of Dublin, the present Lord Chancellor of Ireland, Lord Rosse, and other eminent gentlemen having been Members of the Commission. The Commissioners stated that the University of Dublin possessed, under the 2 Vict. c. 23—which was but a continuation of former enactments—certain privileges with regard to the duty on paper, and that the college was entitled to a drawback upon all Latin and Greek books, as well as religious books, printed by the University. The Commissioners added that—“If the duty upon paper should continue in force that privilege ought to be extended to all books published by the University for educational purposes, and that the University had been very liberal in encouraging the printing of educational books by defraying a large portion of the expense from their funds.”

He (Mr. Hamilton) was sorry to say that it depended upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether they could persevere with the Bill; but he might state that he should certainly be very glad to see the privilege of the University referred to by the hon. Gentleman extended to all books connected with education.

SUPPLY—MISCELLANEOUS ESTIMATES.

House in Committee; Mr. FITZROY in the chair.

(1.) Motion made, and Question proposed—

“That a sum, not exceeding £100,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge of Civil Contingencies, to the 31st day of March 1857.”

SIR FRANCIS BARING moved to reduce the Vote to £30,000. As the House was aware, the Vote for civil contingencies might be divided into two parts—payment of certain items of expenditure, which were essentially uncertain, and therefore could not be brought into estimate, and some other small payments, a return of which for the past year was now on the table of the House; and also an amount which was employed in making advances to different departments. It frequently happened that in the different departments of the civil service, works unexpectedly exceeded the sums voted for them; and, in order to avoid the inconvenience which would attend on their being stopped, recourse was had to the civil contingencies. He did not argue that the £100,000 was an unreasonable amount for these civil contingencies; but he would show that a much larger sum was, in fact, at the disposal of the Government, and he wished the Committee to be aware what the Government had already in hand to meet claims on this very account. He did not know what amount had gone from the civil contingencies in the shape of advances. Advances were not an ultimate expenditure. What were outgoings one year became revenue when the amount was repaid; in point of fact, they added the same quantity to each side of the equation; and the sides balanced each other; and the repayments of the advances of last year would be pretty nearly sufficient to meet those of the current year. The Votes of the civil contingencies were not like the Votes of the great services; they were not confined to the year for which they were taken, and if there was a surplus in the Vote over the expenditure, it did not go back, as a matter of course, to the Exchequer, as it did in the great services; but it accumulated, and was available for the service of the next year. These accumulations existed in the Treasury, as lately as Monday last, to the extent of £100,000. It was now proposed to take a Vote for another £100,000, making the sum at the disposal of the Government £200,000; and, because he thought this sum unnecessarily large, he proposed to reduce it. During the last six years (and the case would be still stronger if he went further back) there had been Votes for the civil contingencies, of £100,000 in each year. In 1851, the actual expenditure was £65,371; in 1851-2 it was £89,675; in 1852-3, £79,825; in 1853-4, about £70,000; in 1854-5, £72,118; and this last year it was £88,891. While, then, the Committee had voted £100,000 a year each year during the last six years, the highest expenditure had been under £90,000; the lowest had been as low as £65,000; and the average expenditure—the actual expenditure—during the six years, had been £77,040, or, putting it loosely, the expenditure had been under £80,000. Inasmuch, then, as on Monday last there was in the Exchequer £100,000 to meet an expenditure averaging less than £80,000, the Government could well afford to lose the £70,000 which he proposed to strike off, and he should then leave them £130,000 to meet an expenditure which in six years had never amounted to £90,000. He thought he had left an ample margin to meet any possible chance of excess. [Mr. WILSON: The balance was made up to the 31st of March.] He knew that; but he was now arguing on the facts as they stood on Monday last. The Secretary of the Treasury had informed him, since he had given his notice, that he had given directions that £60,000 should be returned to the Exchequer as "savings." He was very glad of it; it was accomplishing his (Sir F. Baring's) object in another way; it narrowed the differences between them; and he should in consequence try to effect his reduction of £70,000, by moving a reduction of £10,000 only. He was at a loss to know what his right hon. Friend wanted with the £140,000 which he proposed to take by this Vote, added to the surplus in hand, when the expenditure had never come up to £90,000 a year? There had, it was true, been the illuminations; but the surplus of £50,000 was unnecessarily large for that purpose. Last year the expenditure was £80,000, and he felt sure that the public would be safe with £130,000 to meet the civil contingencies. Besides the unexpended balances he had alluded to, there were other means by which the funds for civil contingencies were increased. The civil contingencies made loans to the other departments. He admitted that it was a great convenience, and that it was right that the Government should have a fund with which to meet any unexpended excess of expenditure by making advances to be subsequently repaid. But, on the other hand, it would be most inconvenient to carry this system an inch further than was absolutely necessary. The case was similar to allowances given to young men in private life. When an allowance was made to a young gentleman, and it was adhered to pretty strictly, he took care not to exceed the amount; but let any one be liberal, and give that young man not only his allowance, but money to meet any excess, and they must not be surprised if there always existed an excess. So, in national matters: if the Treasury would generously and kindly give, they were pretty sure of numerous and repeated applications; if it only made advances under real difficulties, when parties got into scrapes, they would be very slow to get into them; they would be careful not to get into a mess, if the Treasury would not assist them out of it. In the last six years the Committee had voted £600,000, the Treasury had accounted for £462,000 odd, leaving an excess of the amounts voted over the sums expended of £137,000. That ought to be in the Exchequer. He did not believe it was. £100,000 was probably the excess in the Exchequer; and there consequently remained £37,000 unaccounted for, which he apprehended must be either in the hands of the Paymaster General, or else it had been advanced to different departments, of which the Committee knew nothing. He therefore thought that even if by some remarkable accident the amount to which he proposed to limit the Vote for the civil contingencies should be found to be insufficient for the requirements of the year, if the amount required should be far larger than ever it had been during the last six years, the Treasury might supply the deficiency by calling for the repayment of the advances. The information on which the Vote was asked was not sufficient. The Committee had not a statement of the balance in the Exchequer, they had not the amount in the Pay Office, they had not the amount of the sums loaned out; and without those ingredients it was quite impossible to decide on the amount which ought to be voted. His own impression was that the Vote should be taken differently, that they ought to fix a sum which they deemed reasonable; and at the end of the year, if the Government had spent £80,000 let the Committee Vote £80,000 to replace it; but, at any rate, let the Committee know the amount in hand, let them know also what was the amount loaned out in the different Departments. He regarded this as a very important question. He did not see why the amount in hand should be kept from the knowledge of the Committee, or why the amount loaned, should not be known. He saw no occasion for secrecy. He should move to reduce the Vote by £10,000.

Motion made, and Question proposed—

“That a sum, not exceeding £90,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge of Civil Contingencies, to the 31st day of March, 1857.”

Mr. WILSON concurred in the observations of the right hon. Gentleman, as to the very unsatisfactory way in which those accounts had been heretofore kept. The present Board of Treasury was not, however, responsible. If the right hon. Gentleman referred back for a number of years he would find that the whole tendency of the Treasury was to reduce the Vote, and the charges on it. His attention some time since had been called to this Vote, and to the unsatisfactory mode in which it stood, in regard to the audit of accounts. Those accounts had been the subject of much inquiry, and it was considered that they should have been made much more intelligible and satisfactory. If the right hon. Gentleman would but refer to the time when he was Chancellor of the Exchequer, he would find that the sum voted for civil contingencies had been considerably more than double the present amount. If it were possible to estimate the actual sums required there would probably be no occasion to take this Vote for civil contingencies; but since the most unforeseen difficulties were to be provided against, they were obliged to take a Vote considerably in excess of the amount that would be required. It, however, by no means followed that, if they took a Vote larger than was required, all the money should be expended. As to the nature of the advances made he had no objection to lay a statement upon the subject on the table of the House; there were some, however, which it would not be altogether expedient to publish until some little time after they were made. He would, for example, take one of those advances that was necessary for the Government, with a view of showing the difficulty of providing in time for them. The Government were applied to to advance the funds necessary for the trial of experiments in regard to a new gun, called the Lancaster gun; £20,000 was advanced for that purpose. During those experiments it would be obviously inconvenient to lay such accounts before the House. Those advances were, however, never made for the purpose of taking out the service of the year; they were made for services that could not have been foreseen at the time the Vote was submitted to Parliament. There was an advance of £47,000 made to the courts of law. The County Court Act contemplated that those tribunals should be self-supporting, upon the presumption that the fees received would be sufficient to pay the salaries of the Judges and other necessary expenses. The Act, however, provided, that in the event of those fees falling short of the amount necessary for those objects, the Exchequer should be charged with the payment of the amount deficient, which it had accordingly been obliged from time to time to make good. There was at the present time a Bill in the other House which proposed that the charge of those courts should in future be placed on the Consolidated Fund. There was also the Court of Chancery in Ireland, which involved a charge on the civil contingencies of £20,000. The suitors' fund fell short of the amount necessary to pay the Judges' salaries and the other expenses; the excess was made a charge upon the Exchequer, and upon that score there was an advance made of £28,000. In various services of that kind advances out of the Treasury were made to the amount of £158,000. Now, although a great portion of this money would be repaid, there would be other services of a similar kind to absorb the whole Vote. The fluctuating nature of the charges was also a matter of great difficulty to provide for. The Vote last year, for example, was £100,000; but the whole advances to the public service amounted to £246,000. In the year before the advances were £227,000, and in the prior year they were only £83,000. The only instance in which any repayment had as yet been made in respect to these advances was £60,000. He had no hesitation in saying, on examining the accounts of the Comptroller of the Exchequer, that there was a balance in the Exchequer of about £100,000. He had had a Dr. and Cr. account of these advances and repayments, showing the balances, for the last ten years drawn up. This account showed every shilling that had been advanced and repaid; and it appeared that, without including the Irish advances, the whole amount of the outstanding balance due was only £1,900. He had also given orders that there shall be made with the Estimates of each year, not only an account of the expenditure of civil contingencies, but also a cash account, showing the amount of the advances repaid; and in cases where it was not desirable to mention the names of the parties in question, the particular department to which the advances were made should be mentioned. Under these circumstances he trusted that the right hon. Gentleman would not deem it necessary to divide the Committee upon his Amendment.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, it appeared that the civil contingencies accounts were in an unsatisfactory state. He should like to know with whom the fault rested. The present Government had been in office for nearly three years.

MR. WILSON denied that he stated the civil contingencies accounts were in an unsatisfactory state. On the contrary, he thought that the civil contingencies accounts were never in a more satisfactory state. From the years 1830 to 1840 the accounts were so confused it was quite impossible to make anything of them. He did not mean to blame any persons for this state of things, because he knew that the difficulties which had arisen during that period were calculated to complicate those accounts.

MR. W. WILLIAMS: Well, then, the system was altogether defective, and he should like to know with what Government the blame rested. He had no idea that the abuse was so great. This seemed to be a department for lending money; and he was afraid there were a good many bad debts made. From what source was the money lent to the Irish Court of Chancery to be repaid? They now found out that they had been voting increases to the salaries of the Judges of the county courts, under the false pretence that the fees of those courts paid their expenses. For several of the items included in this sum there ought to have been distinct and separate Votes of the House. He objected to the whole system. More than one-half the items in last year's expenditure might have been brought before the Committee last year. He would like to know, was the Commission appointed to settle the boundary between Turkey and Persia to be continued, or was General Williams to be succeeded by another Commissioner? Several items for the travelling expenses of official persons—one amounting to £364 10s. 9d.—seemed to him to be exorbitant. There was an item of £1,700 in the case of the Commission connected with the affairs of the University of Oxford. Now, the revenues of the University amounted to about £150,000 a year, and he wanted to know why the public should pay the £1,700?

MR. AYSHFORD WISE said, it was a consolation to him that the very objections which he had proposed to make, had been made by one, who, from his experience as a Chancellor of the Exchequer, was so much better able than himself to cope with the difficulties of finance. The Secretary of the Treasury had cleared away some of the mist that surrounded the Vote, and, indeed, had rendered unnecessary the remarks which he intended to offer, by the admission that the accounts were in an unsatisfactory state. The right hon. Member for Portsmouth had gone back six years, but, taking the Votes and expenditure for ten years, he found that the first amounted to a £1,000,000, and the second to £794,549, leaving a balance of £205,451 in favour of the Treasury. The explanation given was not satisfactory, as the leaving this large sum loose in the waistcoat pocket of the Secretary of the Treasury encouraged loans and advances to the various departments and much unjustifiable expenditure, which had not been sanctioned by the House. A great abuse had sprung up of late in the multiplication of Commissions, and no less a sum than £75,000 had been expended in that manner during the last three years. Commissions were now appointed on all imaginary subjects; which was a system that ought to be discouraged. There were in this Vote a great number of charges, such as those for permanent Commissions, like the Fine Arts Commission, which were not of an accidental character, and therefore did not properly belong to such a Vote as this. He would call the attention of the Committee to the effect of this Vote for contingencies on the expenditure for the Diplomatic Establishment. By 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 116, the Government was restricted to £180,000 a year for salaries, pensions, and expenses, but that limit was indirectly avoided and continually transgressed by these Votes for contingencies. During the last ten years, in addition to the salaries and pensions, there had been paid £52,973 in outfits, £91,915 in special missions, £100,000 for house rent, and £208,099 for miscellaneous expenses. During the last twenty-five years the extra disbursements had amounted to £524,545, and the outfit to £157,283. It was commonly supposed that the Paris Embassy cost about £10,000 a year, but the expenditure was not less than £19,000, besides the maintenance of the Embassy House and the interest of the £87,000 that had been expended on that building. If we were to judge of the future by the past, he recommended the Committee to look with an eye of distrust on this Vote for contingencies, as one that had a tendency to increase rather than to decrease the public expenditure, and had proved in no way conducive to economy.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, that the sums voted under the head of "civil contingencies" during the last six years amounted in the aggregate to £600,000, and of that sum £457,000 had been expended. What had become of the £143,000 balance? He would like to know why the Government set down the balance as £100,000, when it was in reality £143,000? The Committee had been that evening informed that the department to which this contingency money was voted was in the habit of lending money. Now, was it to be distinctly understood that all those loan advances were for the future to be set out on a paper to be laid upon the table of the House? The Committee were going to Vote £100,000 for civil contingencies, while probably only £75,000 would be the total sum expended. At what time of year were they to have the annual expenditure for contingencies placed upon the table of the House? [Mr. Wilson: When the Estimates are presented.] The hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Treasury had stated that there was a cash balance of only £60,000 last year; but he (Sir H. Willoughby) thought that there should be a sum of £80,000 from last year; and that the gross balance on the six years was £143,000. Were the fireworks for the peace, and the expense of the mission to St. Petersburg, to be charged to "civil contingencies?"

CAPTAIN STUART asked for an explanation of an item of £5,000, "an advance to J. B. Fearon, on account of bills of costs as solicitor to the Attorney General in suits relating to charities?" This was a large sum for the country to be called upon to pay for such a purpose.

MR. KINNAIRD observed on the absurdity of charging against the civil contingencies the expense of making an experiment with a Lancaster gun. The item ought surely to have been inserted in the Ordnance Estimates. The practice of introducing into the Estimates of one department entries that properly belonged to those of another was to be deprecated, inasmuch as it wore the resemblance of an attempt to pass by a side-wind grants which, if presented in a regular manner, might not easily obtain the sanction of Parliament.

MR. SPOONER wished to ask whether any application had been made to the Treasury by the Ordnance Department for money to make experiments in Belgium, or to send workmen over to that country to make experiments? He wished, in fact, to know whether experiments had been made in Belgium; what those experiments were; whether the Ordnance Department had sent over workmen to make them; and whether advances for such experiments had been made by the Treasury?

MR. BLACKBURN found in this estimate an item of £105 for preparing the "Oxford University Reform Bill," to R. J. Phillimore. Then there was an item of £48 16s. 4d. "for revoking the office of Master General of the Ordnance, and vesting the civil administration of the Army and Ordnance in Lord Panmure;" and another of £39 14s. "for appointing the Duke of Argyll Postmaster General." Was it usual for the public to pay for the appointment of public officers, or were those two cases exceptional? There was another item which he would wish to hear explained—a sum of £1,500 "to the Hon. J. Plunket, Second Commissioner of Bankrupts in Ireland, on account of salary for one year." Was not that salary a fixed annual amount? If so, why should it be put under the head of "civil contingencies," instead of under "law expenses?"

MR. WILSON would, in replying to the several questions put by hon. Members, commence with those asked by the hon. Member who had just sat down. The item of £105 to which that hon. Member had alluded was a sum paid to Mr. R. J. Phillimore for drawing the Oxford University Bill. With regard to the items paid on the appointments of Lord Panmure and the Duke of Argyll, the rule was that the person who accepted an official office paid for his own patent; but if a person was transferred from one office to another, he was not called upon to defray the cost of the second patent. In this latter case the public paid for the patent. With respect to the £1,500 for the Second Commissioner of Bankrupts in Ireland, there was no provision by Act of Parliament for granting a salary to that officer, and therefore his remuneration was included under the head of civil contingencies. However, in the Bill now before the House that would be remedied; the necessary provision would be made for the salary of the additional Commissioner, and the charge would henceforth be included in the estimates in the usual way. As to the inquiry made by the hon. Member for Warwickshire (Mr. Spooner), no payment of any kind had been made for sending workmen to Belgium; nor had any application been made by the Ordnance Department for an advance for any such purpose. He had made inquiry on the subject, and could assure the hon. Member that there was no truth in the report that the Ordnance had sent any workmen to that country. With regard to the experiments with the Lancaster gun, his hon. Friend (Mr. Kinnaird) must have misunderstood what he had said on that subject. What he had intended to convey was, that before such experiments were made it would not be judicious of the Government to come down to the House and ask for a Vote for those experiments. Was it not obvious that in such cases the House should trust to the Executive? Otherwise the country might obtain no benefit from experiments of the kind referred to. The whole of the advances made from the Vote for civil contingencies had to be brought under the review of the House and voted before they could be repaid to the account from which they were originally taken. The hon. Baronet opposite (Sir H. Willoughby) said he found in the last six years an apparent discrepancy of £143,000 between the sum expended and that voted; that £100,000 remained in the Exchequer in March last; but no account was given of the balance of £43,000. The fact was, that the advances made to the different services last year and the year before exceeded those of preceding years, and the amount of reimbursements now due to the account of civil contingencies was not £143,000, but £158,000. In regard to the cost of the fireworks for the peace rejoicings, the Chancellor of the Exchequer had already explained that it was not deemed worth while to propose a separate estimate for this item of expense, and therefore it was included in the Vote for civil contingencies; and the expenses of the mission to St. Petersburg, being an unusual payment, properly came under that head. As to the sums alluded to by the hon. Member for Lambeth (Mr. Williams) as having been paid for the outfit of our Ambassadors abroad, and for "special missions," it was quite obvious that no estimate could be formed of such expenses. The sum of £364 10s. travelling expenses, referred to by that hon. Member, was for the expenses incurred by Governor Sir W. Denison for passage of himself and family from Hobart Town to Sydney. There was a fixed allowance to colonial Governors for expenses of that nature, regulated by a scale prescribed by Colonial Office. As to the sums paid for Commissions, the University Commissioners had been appointed under the University Act, and the payments made were to the secretaries, and on account of general charges, but the Commissioners themselves were not paid. The sum paid on account of the settlement of the boundary between Turkey and Persia was a payment of last and not of this year. As to the question of the hon. and gallant Captain (Captain Stuart), his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General was not then present, but he would at another time give an explanation of that item of £5,000.

SIR FRANCIS BARING did not intend to give the Committee the trouble to divide, but in withdrawing his Motion he must say, that he was not satisfied with his hon. Friend's explanation. He should be glad to know from his hon. Friend, if he was prepared to give at once a statement of the advances made, and to produce the account which he said was so satisfactory. There was a peculiarity in the phrase, used by his hon. Friend, that advances were not made from the civil contingencies to eke out Votes of which estimates had been given. Take the case of the Ordnance. The Ordnance was under strict rule that every sixpence of expenditure should be audited, and that entire control should be exercised over its expenditure. He did not quarrel with the expenditure, but what was the fact? The Ordnance had been expending in experiments more than Parliament had voted, which sums were unaudited and uncontrolled. That was the very example of all others to show that the civil contingencies were in an unsatisfactory state. If his hon. Friend could give the House the paper he had spoken of, he would be satisfied with the £60,000 he had got, and would not press the subject further.

MR. LLOYD DAVIES wished to know from the Secretary to the Treasury, whether the payment of 100 guineas to the hon. Member for Tavistock (Mr. R. Phillimore) for assisting in the preparation of the Oxford University Bill was made whilst that hon. and learned Gentleman was a Member of that House? He did not mean to say that the amount was more than adequate to the services rendered by the hon. Gentleman, but the question was, if it did not involve constitutional considerations, and affect the character of the House itself. He thought it desirable that an explanation should be given upon the subject.

MR. MOWBRAY wished to know whether any further sum would be required for the fireworks exhibited on the 29th ult. beyond the £8,000 which had been stated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer as the estimated expenditure?

MR. WILSON said, that as the accounts for the fireworks had not yet been received, he could not state precisely what would be the expenditure. Some expense had, of course, been incurred in the preparation of the fireworks by the department at Woolwich; but he believed the amount named by the Chancellor of the Exchequer on a former occasion would be the sum required as an extra charge on the public; but it should be recollected that some part of the expense would be borne by the Ordnance Department under which they had been prepared, and it was merely the extraneous charges which would be defrayed out of the civil contingencies. With respect to the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Tavistock, he believed that he was a Member of the House when he received the payment referred to by the hon. Gentleman opposite. With regard to the observations of the right hon. Baronet the Member for Portsmouth, he had to state that no advances had been made to eke out any Vote granted by Parliament for specific purposes, but that the advances from the civil contingencies were always made for services and purposes which could not be foreseen, and for which, therefore, no provision could be made. The case of the Ordnance experiments was of this nature. With regard to the accounts which he was prepared to lay before the House, they had not been prepared in consequence of anything that had been either said or done by the right hon. Baronet, because the attention of the Treasury had been for a long period directed to the subject, with the view of presenting a clear and satisfactory statement of the expenditure under this head. He would in a few days be able to lay them on the table of the House. They would embrace the total expenditure, distinguishing every advance and repayment made for the last fifteen years, and show the balance in the Exchequer.

MR. LLOYD DAVIES thought the answer which had been given to his question by the hon. Secretary to the Treasury was not at all satisfactory. He wished to know whether the payment to the hon. and learned Member for Tavistock had been sanctioned by the Government, and he thought it necessary that there should be a clear understanding on the subject. If the payment had been made inadvertently, he had nothing more to say about the matter, but a constitutional principle of vital importance was involved, for if Members of the House received such payments it was impossible to doubt that their freedom of action must be in some degree influenced. He did not bring forward this question with any special reference to the hon. and learned Member for Tavistock, but simply upon public grounds.

MR. WILSON said, it was not for the Treasury to determine the constitutional question to which the hon. Gentleman had referred. A demand was made upon the Treasury for a sum for the performance of certain duties, and it was no part of the duty of the Treasury to inquire whether the person who performed such duties was entitled to perform them or not.

MR. GLADSTONE submitted that the question which been put by the hon. Member for Cardigan was one which ought to receive the most satisfactory answer that could be given. He (Mr. Gladstone) had thought this matter had been settled long ago, and he did not know how it happened that it was now brought to the notice of the Committee. The hon. Member for Cardigan deemed it a dangerous practice to employ Members of that House professionally in the preparation of Bills, and he (Mr. Gladstone) thought the hon. Gentleman was quite justified in calling attention to the payment to which he had referred. It was undoubtedly expedient and necessary that the attention of the House should be carefully fixed upon payments of this nature, and that any tendency to make a practice of such payments should be discouraged. It was right that the House should require to be informed of the special reasons which had led to the payment in this particular instance, and, speaking from recollection, and therefore not with perfect confidence, he (Mr. Gladstone) would endeavour to afford some explanation. The payment in question had reference to the drawing of the Oxford University Bill. He was himself much concerned, but of course not professionally or officially, in the preparation of materials for that measure. His hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General was the person who, on the part of the Government, drew the Bill, that was to say, who superintended and was responsible for its drawing; and officially it was under his direction that the hon. and learned Member for Tavistock was employed in the preparation of the measure. He (Mr. Gladstone) did not exempt himself from responsibility on that score, because he was perfectly cognisant of the arrangement, and, while he admitted that special reasons only ought to justify such an arrangement, he fully approved it at the time. The case of the Oxford University and its colleges was a most peculiar case; and although it would have been perfectly easy to find numbers of lawyers who were capable of drawing bills upon almost any other subject, there were few who possessed such knowledge of the history of the foundations of the Universities and Colleges as to be capable of drawing a Bill with reference to that University. It was on that ground, and because it appeared both to his hon. and learned Friend and himself that the hon. and learned Member for Tavistock was conversant with such subjects, and able to render valuable assistance which they did not think it practicable to find elsewhere, that his professional services were employed in drawing up the Bill and putting it into a formal and legal shape. He thanked the hon. Gentleman opposite for drawing attention to the subject; for there could be no doubt that the general rule was adverse to the employment of Members of the House for such purposes. But the hon. Gentleman was not to suppose that this was the first time such a thing had taken place. On the contrary, cases had occurred from time to time in which Members had been so employed, and he perfectly agreed with the hon. Gentleman in thinking that it was one of those matters which the House should be careful not to overlook.

LORD HOTHAM: The Secretary to the Treasury had observed that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in stating that the cost of the fireworks would not exceed £8,000 must be understood as not including in that amount the cost incurred at Woolwich. Now that was not a strictly accurate representation of the case, and he (Lord Hotham) was competent to speak upon the point, because he happened to be the person who had addressed the interrogatory to the right hon. Gentleman on the subject. The right hon. Gentleman having previously stated that the expense would amount to £8,000, he (Lord Hotham), on a subsequent day, asked him if he intended to lay an estimate of the contemplated expenditure incurred in the preparations made in London as those which were being incurred in the Royal Arsenal at Woolwich. The answer of the right hon. Gentleman was that the Government did not contemplate laying an estimate upon the table; that it was intended to pay the expense out of the civil contingencies, and he added emphatically that he was informed, and believed, that the expenditure would not exceed £8,000. Now an answer given to an inquiry made in that way, referring to the expenditure in London and at Wool-wich, must surely be taken by any man of plain understanding, to mean that the total expense would not exceed the sum mentioned by the right hon. Gentleman; and he confessed that, however surprised he might have been at hearing that the cost would amount to no more, he certainly did consider and had so stated to several hon. Gentlemen in the House, that the right hon. Gentleman had pledged himself as solemnly to the House as one gentleman could pledge himself to another upon any subject, that £8,000 would cover the whole of the expense that would be incurred on the occasion.

Motion by leave withdrawn.

Original question put and agreed to.

(2.) Motion made, and Question proposed—

“That a sum, not exceeding £151,213, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge for Public Education in Great Britain, to the 31st day of March, 1857.”

SIR GEORGE GREY: Sir, I rise to propose the annual Vote for public education—£151,213, of which £300,000 has been already voted on account; but, as there is a very full explanatory minute attached to the estimate, containing paragraphs corresponding to each particular item, it will not be necessary that I should give any lengthened explanation to the House. At the same time, as the grant proposed to be taken this year is greater than in any former year, and exceeds by £54,292 the sum voted last year, and as a proposal is to be made by an hon. Member to reduce the amount, I will take the liberty of calling the attention of the House to the past expenditure on account of education, to the appropriation of the funds placed at the disposal of the Committee of Privy Council by Parliament, and particularly to the grounds on which the increase of this year has taken place. I am the more desirous to do so as I am anxious to remove an impression which I am afraid prevails in some quarters that, because there are difficulties in establishing throughout the country a general system of combined education, therefore nothing can be done by Parliament in aid of the efforts made for promoting the great object of popular education throughout the country. Whatever opinions we may entertain as to the expediency of a general system of education—however much we may regret the failure of those attempts which have been made from time to time by men of influence to secure that important object, it would be wrong on our part if we did not acknowledge that, these attempts having failed, very important and very beneficial results have been attained by means of these Parliamentary grants that are placed at the disposal of the Committee of Privy Council, and which are appropriated by that Committee in accordance with certain Minutes regulating the principle of appropriation. Since the year 1839 a sum rather exceeding £2,000,000 has been placed by Parliament, by annual grant, in the hands of the Committee of Privy Council for the promotion of popular education, and that sum has been expended in aid of those voluntary efforts to which allusion has been made, and very justly made, in previous debates on the subject of education—efforts that cannot be too highly estimated and commended, but which, I believe, have failed in accomplishing all the objects sought to be attained by them, and which would not have been attended with the success which has accompanied them had they not been aided by the grants which Parliament has made. It is a fact not unworthy of notice, that, during the first ten years, the amount placed annually at the disposal of the Committee was never wholly expended. There remained annually an accumulated balance in the hands of the Committee, the applications for money not having exhausted the amount. But from that time the reverse has been the case, and the expenditure has annually exceeded the sum granted by Parliament, the deficit being supplied by the unappropriated balances of the sums provided by Parliament in the previous years. The inference we are to draw from this is, that the discussions from time to time, either on Motions submitted to this House or on the considerations of the annual Estimates, have given a great impulse to the efforts made to promote education, and that there has been a growing and rapidly increasing appreciation of the benefits derived from the grants which have been made by Parliament in aid of the voluntary efforts to promote that important object. In 1839 the grant was £30,000; last year it was £396,921; and this year the amount proposed is £451,213, of which £200,000 has been already voted by the House. To show the progressive increase of the expenditure, I have here a comparative table, showing the amount expended in each year

Bill read 2^o, and committed for To-morrow at Twelve o'clock.

MR. GLADSTONE said, that Members sitting below the gangway might just as well be out of the House as in it after a division. They could hear nothing, no matter what efforts they might make. If he had heard the arrangement to take the Committee on the Bill to-morrow at twelve o'clock, he certainly should have represented that it was very desirable opportunity should be afforded of giving notice of Amendments, and he apprehended the mere statement of objection would have been conclusive. As the matter now stood, he did not wish to give trouble, but he begged to represent the case to his noble Friend at the head of the Government.

MR. HENLEY said, he hoped the noble Lord would, at all events, reconsider the appointment for twelve o'clock. Members hardly received the Votes by that hour.

MR. GLADSTONE said, no notices of Amendment could be given.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, there was other business at six o'clock to-morrow evening, and it would be very uncertain at what time the Committee on the Bill would commence if it were postponed to the evening sitting. He thought the numerous attendance that morning was sufficient proof that they might consider the Amendments at twelve o'clock. The right hon. Gentlemen might move what Amendments they pleased, and the House would, of course, not object on the ground that they were moved without notice.

The House adjourned at Six o'clock.

THE MUTINY AT NENAGH—QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE asked the Secretary for War what course the Government intended to pursue for the purpose of bringing to justice the mutineers at Nenagh—whether they proposed to have them punished under the civil or military law? He would add, that he felt it his duty to bear testimony to the promptitude, energy, and decision which were shown by General Chatterton, the general commanding the district, in putting down the mutiny.

LORD PANMURE said, he would state at once that the mutiny at Nenagh would be dealt with by the Government with the utmost firmness. Their Lordships were aware that in the course of the mutiny various outrages were committed, including one case of murder, and three serious cases of assault. According to the regulations observed in the army, as well as in civil life, the accused parties in those cases would be delivered over to the civil tribunals, to be proceeded against by them. He was happy to state that he had received from the authorities in Ireland information which led him to believe that the ring-leaders in the mutiny would be identified and speedily brought to justice. Those offenders who had been guilty of purely military offences would be dealt with by the military authorities. He thought it right to bear testimony to the admirable behaviour of the whole of the rest of the Irish militia, and he was assured by the Secretary for Ireland that such of the Irish militia as had returned home were perfectly contented with the terms on which they had been dismissed. He wished, also, to bear testimony to the energy and zeal of General Chatterton, in the discharge of the grave and responsible duties which were entrusted to him on the occasion of this unfortunate occurrence.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH said, he had that morning been examining some papers in reference to the militia, which enabled him to confirm the terms of praise in which the noble Lord the Secretary for War had spoken of the Irish militia. He found that, while the desertions, or, more properly speaking, the absences from muster had been 23½ per cent in the English militia and 20 per cent in the Scotch militia, they had been less than 5 per cent in the Irish militia. In the same manner, while the enlistments into the regular army were 7½ per cent from the English militia and 14½ from the Scotch, they had been 21 per cent from the Irish militia. So that the Irish militia was incomparably the most valuable militia force of the three.

THE LEGION OF HONOUR—DISTRIBUTION TO THE ENGLISH ARMY—QUESTION.

LORD CALTHORPE said, he wished to ask the Secretary for War a question in reference to the recent distribution of the Legion of Honour among the officers of the English army. He had recently read a list of those officers, and he was surprised to find that not one of the aides-de-camp of the late Lord Raglan was included in it. After the battle of Inkerman, the Emperor of the French notified to Lord Raglan his wish to confer on him the highest rank of the Legion of Honour, and to bestow decorations on the officers of his staff. Lord Raglan, about the end of November or the beginning of December, wrote to the English Government to obtain their permission to accept these honours, but he obtained no answer until about five weeks before his death—an interval of six months. After the death of Lord Raglan, Marshal Pelissier intimated to the French Government that it would be paying a just and proper respect to the memory of the noble Lord if they were to bestow some decorations on his staff. This suggestion was approved by the Emperor, and it was communicated to the English Government, but nothing more had been heard of the matter, until the general distribution of the French honours took place, when it was thought that the claims of Lord Raglan's staff would not be overlooked. When it was considered that the French Government had intimated their wish that the decorations should be distributed as a mark of respect to the memory of Lord Raglan, he was justified in saying that the exclusion of these officers from the number of those who received the decorations appeared like a slur on Lord Raglan's memory. He therefore asked the noble Lord why the names of these officers were omitted from the list of those receiving the decorations, and whether the English Government had not received some communication from the French Government with respect to their wishes on the subject?

THE DUKE OF CLEVELAND said, it appeared to him very extraordinary that the staff of Lord Raglan had not received the decorations which were certainly intended for them, and he could not help thinking that there had been some mistake. One officer who was well known, and who had been with Lord Raglan at the Alma and Inkerman, and remained with him up to his death—he meant Colonel Somerset, one of his aides-de-camp—had told him (the Duke of Cleveland) that he had been in constant communication, on the part of Lord Raglan, with the three French commanders—St. Arnaud, Canrobert, and Pelissier—and that he had heard them distinctly say that it was the most anxious wish of the Emperor that all his staff should receive the decoration of the Legion of Honour; and, as the noble Lord had just stated, the Emperor himself, after the battle of Inkerman, sent an intimation to Lord Raglan that he would receive the highest decoration of the Legion of Honour, and that all his personal staff would also be decorated.

LORD COLCHESTER considered that these decorations had been given away in a rather incautious manner. A friend of his, commanding a line of battle ship, had received from his own Sovereign the Order of the Bath, but in the distribution of the French honours he was passed over, although it had been given to his first lieutenant, although that officer, however meritorious, had never seen any land service.

LORD PANMURE reminded the House that nothing gave so much dissatisfaction as the distribution of military honours. With regard to the general question as to the distribution of the Cross of the Legion of Honour given by the French Emperor to the army of the Queen, he would, in the first place, state that he was not responsible for the selection of the different officers. When the intentions of the Emperor were made known to the English Government through the Foreign Office, the Commander in Chief instructed the commanders of the army in the East, Generals Simpson and Codrington, to return a list of the names, and that list was afterwards sent to the French Government. Therefore, if any complaint were made as to the manner of the selection, the responsibility did not rest with the Government. But, at the same time, he was quite convinced that both General Simpson and General Codrington made the selection in accordance with the opinions they had formed of the services rendered by the different officers, and with a view to a fair distribution of the honours throughout the army; and he believed that they had acted in an impartial manner, and without favour or affection. In reference to the question of the noble Baron, he had to state that he had inquired at the Foreign Office whether there was any communication with regard to the distribution of the Order of the Legion of Honour to Lord Raglan or his staff; and the answer he had received was, that there was no trace in the office of any correspondence on the subject; nor could he trace any correspondence on the subject in his own department. But it was probable that the intimation of the French Emperor, as to his conferring these decorations, might be found in the private correspondence of Lord Raglan to his (Lord Panmure's) predecessor. It was wrong to suppose that there was any disposition to cast a slur upon the memory of Lord Raglan. There was not an officer on his staff who had not received one or two steps of promotion, or had not been decorated with the Companionship of the Bath from his own Sovereign. With regard to Colonel Somerset, that officer went out as lieutenant-colonel in Lord Raglan's staff. He had only just received his lieutenant-colonelcy, and was too young to be promoted over the heads of a vast number of lieutenant colonels who were senior to him. However, he had been made a C.B. It was impossible that the general commanding in chief or Her Majesty's Government could be accused of having shown any disposition to cast a slur on the memory of Lord Raglan.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH said, he could not understand how any officer could desire to wear a decoration vicariously, not on account of his own merits, but on account of the merits of the General under whom he had served. Honours were valueless unless they were bestowed for the services of those who wore them. At the commencement of the last war he had ventured to suggest the principle—the only true and correct principle—that no man should receive a decoration except for service under fire. A decoration given for any other kind of service was a deception upon the public, and did no honour to the gentleman who received it. He knew several good officers who were entitled to decorations under general rules, but who had refused to wear them on the ground that they did not come within the principle he had stated. He had heard that all the officers and seamen employed in the Baltic fleet were to receive decorations. Why, hardly any of those men had the opportunity of being under fire; hardly 300 of them were ever within reach of shot! It was no fault of theirs, and they had rendered great services in another way—fighting was almost the least part of a sailor's duty—but they were not entitled to a medal. To give them a medal would be contrary to all the principles on which honorary distinctions were granted by nations for the purpose of encouraging military ambition. He had read the list of persons who were to receive honour from the French Government, and there seemed to him to be a profound misconception as to the relative value of the individuals on whom honours were to be bestowed. This was not the first instance, for at the close of the last war the same thing was done to a limited extent; but he hoped it would be the last instance of an interchange of honours between nations; officers should be made to know that they must look to their own Sovereign, and to their own Sovereign alone, for the honours they earned by their service in the field. That was the true principle, and any departure from it was likely to lead to mischievous results.

THE DUKE OF CLEVELAND remarked that the officers to whom he had alluded had been under fire.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH understood the noble Lord who had commenced the discussion to complain that a reflection had been cast upon Lord Raglan by no honours being granted to the gentlemen upon his staff. He inferred, therefore, that they claimed these honours in consideration of the services of Lord Raglan.

LORD CALTHORPE said, that the services of Lord Raglan's aides-de-camp had been seen and acknowledged by all the French commanders.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH observed, that aides-de-camp were not, generally speaking, ill-treated men. They usually received a larger share of promotions and honours, and were subjected to less hardship than regimental officers.

The Earl of Ellenborough

MARRIAGE LAW (SCOTLAND) AMENDING BILL.

Commons' Amendments considered (according to Order).

THE LORD CHANCELLOR moved, that the said Amendments be agreed to.

LORD PORTMAN begged to remind their Lordships of a Standing Order passed in 1707, by which the Lord Chancellor was obliged to explain to the House any Amendments made by the Commons in Bills sent down by their Lordships, and was glad that the noble and learned Lord on the woolsack generally observed that rule. It was, however, quite impossible that the Lord Chancellor could find time to discharge this necessary and important duty, and he would, therefore, suggest to the Government the propriety of transferring it to some one else. He would, therefore, give notice of his intention, next Session, to move that no Amendments should be proposed on the third reading of a public Bill, unless such Amendments had been printed.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, the noble Lord seemed to be unaware that he had already announced, on the part of the Government, their intention to propose, in the next Session of Parliament, the appointment of an officer connected with both Houses of Parliament, whose duty it would be to supervise the legislation of public Bills, and who would therefore take cognisance of the Amendments made by either House on the Bills passed by the other.

Agreed to.

MERCANTILE LAW AMENDMENT BILL.

Commons' Amendments considered (according to Order).

THE LORD CHANCELLOR deeply regretted that the House of Commons had thought fit to reject a clause in this Bill which had been strenuously opposed in this House, as their Lordships would remember, by Lord Overstone. He, however, moved that the Commons' Amendments to the Bill be agreed to.

Agreed to.

PAROCHIAL SCHOOLS (SCOTLAND) BILL.

Commons' Amendments to One of the Lords' Amendments, and their Reasons for disagreeing to several of the Lords' Amendments, considered (according to Order).

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, he was sorry to find that the noble Duke (the Duke of Buccleuch) intended to persist in the Amendments he had succeeded in introducing in this House, notwithstanding the disagreement of the House of Commons from those Amendments. Knowing, however, the authority which the noble Duke possessed with their Lordships, and that he commanded a majority of that House, he (the Duke of Argyll) should not think it worth while to trouble their Lordships with a division; but would simply say "Not content" to the Motion that this House do insist upon the Amendments made by them in this Bill. In his opinion, the principal fault in the present Bill was, that it gave to the heritors too much power in the choice of schoolmasters, and not power enough to the ratepayers. He must repeat his regret that this Bill, which was a compromise between the two parties in Scotland, was not agreed to by the noble Duke. He conceived that they must fall back in Scotland upon what was called the denominational system. In England there could be no doubt that that system, under the aids granted by the Committee of Privy Council, had, on the whole, operated in favour of the Established Church. In Scotland he did not believe that it would operate in the same manner. There was a feeling of jealousy and dislike on the part of the Free Church against the great landowners of Scotland, which was aroused in 1843, and which, he was sorry to say, had not yet diminished. They had in Scotland a great rival body conducting most successfully a system of education.

THE DUKE OF BUCCLEUCH said, that he should insist upon the Amendments of their Lordships, with the exception of the first. The compromise of which his noble Friend spoke he regarded as nothing else than the yielding up of the great principle upon which the parochial schools of Scotland were founded. Something had been said in another place respecting the application of the "screw;" but he understood it had been held out that if this Bill did not pass, the schoolmasters would receive no salary, and be left to starve; if the term "screw" was applicable to anything at all, surely it might be to a threat like that. As to introducing the influence of the ratepayers—in many parishes of Scotland there were no ratepayers at all, and the heritors were the only persons to whom the schoolmasters could look for maintenance and support. So far as the Bill carried out the principle laid down in the preamble—"That it was expedient to make further provision for schoolmasters," there could be no objection to it; but he did object to the mode in which it proceeded to alter and regulate the system of schools. What was a good argument for dealing with the schools might hereafter be an equally good argument for the Church, and he looked upon the measure, in short, as but a first step towards a direct attack upon the Establishment. It was only in 1850 that his noble Friend delivered a speech in which he argued that the present system of education in Scotland was a national system; and certainly it was not more national then than it was at this moment. The education was not confined to one sect, for the children of parents of all denominations were freely admitted into the schools and received their instruction there; and the only objection which the noble Duke and some of his Friends could urge against it was, that they could not subscribe to the formula of the Church of Scotland. He (the Duke of Buccleuch) assured his noble Friend that he had no personal hostility whatever towards the Free Church. So far from that, a large number of persons for whom he entertained the highest respect, and also several of his own intimate friends, were members of that communion. If, therefore, there was any personal feeling mixed up in the matter it was on the part of others, not his. He should insist upon all their Lordships' Amendments with the exception of the first.

LORD PANMURE said, he was afraid that the opposition to this Bill rested on an unfounded opinion that it was chiefly advocated by the Free Church of Scotland; but, in truth, it mattered little to that Church, as a Church, whether the Bill passed or not. He should not abandon the hope that, at some future time, the parochial schools would be placed on a more reasonable footing than at present.

Then it was moved, not to insist on Clause A., added by the Lords to the Bill, to which the Commons disagree; agreed to: Then it was moved, to agree to the Amendment made by the Commons reinstating Clauses XII. and XIV.; on Question, Resolved in the Negative: Then it was moved, not to insist on the Omission of Clause XVIII., to which the Commons disagree; on Question, Whether to insist? Resolved in the Affirmative; and a Committee appointed to prepare Reasons to be offered to the Commons for the Lords disagreeing to One of the Commons Amendments to the Lords Amendments, and insisting on One of the Lords Amendments to which the Commons disagree: The Committee to meet immediately: The Committee reported Reasons prepared by them; the same were read, and agreed to; and a Message was Ordered to be sent to the Commons to return the Bill, with the Amendments and Reasons.

House adjourned till To-morrow.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, July 24, 1856.

MINUTE.] NEW MEMBER SWORN.—For Dorchester, Charles Napier Sturt, esq.

BISHOPS OF LONDON AND DURHAM RETIREMENT BILL.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MR. HADFIELD said, he rose to move that the House resolve itself into Committee that day three months. He belonged to a class of Her Majesty's subjects who had no temporal interest in the Church of England, except so far as the temporalities of that Church were contrary to the spirit of true religion. It seemed to him as if Parliament was monopolised by one denomination of Christians. Nobody appeared to bear in mind that the Church of England comprised only one-third of the population of the United Kingdom. Of the 27,000,000 of inhabitants 9,000,000 only were members of the Established Church; the remaining 18,000,000 consisted of Roman Catholics, Nonconformists, and the established Presbyterians of Scotland. Yet there was this peculiarity, that while Parliament was constantly engaged in discussing questions concerning the temporalities of the Church of England, the remaining 18,000,000 of the people never troubled Parliament in any way respecting pecuniary assistance except in two very insignificant cases. The days were gone by when the character of a Bishop of this realm was not to be made the subject of public discussion. The halo which it had been attempted to throw around Bishops and the sanctity with which the State had sought to invest them, excited in him no sympathy whatever. When, therefore, the Bishop of London came before the House, the only light in which he (Mr. Hadfield) contemplated the right rev. Prelate was that of a fellow citizen and a fellow Christian subject. He apprehended that the right rev. Prelate did not stand so high in the estimation of the English people as some hon. Gentlemen would represent. Neither as a scholar, as a divine, or as a public teacher, did he stand on equal terms of competition with many Ministers of the various denominations into which the other two-thirds of the people were divided. The general opinion was, that the right rev. Prelate carried his High Church principles and his bigotry to an extent which rendered him unacceptable to a large number of persons. He believed it was a fact that many of the votes given yesterday in support of the Bill were for the purpose of relieving the diocese of that right rev. Prelate's supervision, replacing him by an abler and a better man. By a recent Act of Parliament, it was settled that the salary of the Bishop of London should be £10,000 a year, whereas the real amount had been stated, on good authority, to be £22,000 a year. Now, this was suffered to take place in a Church to which belonged 10,000 clergymen, whose annual incomes did not exceed, upon the average, £100 per annum. This right rev. Prelate was formerly a schoolmaster. He (Mr. Hadfield) mentioned it to his honour. Every man who raised himself by his industry, integrity, and abilities was entitled to respect; but surely such a gentleman was not to be allowed, after having had the administration of the vast territorial revenue of £22,000 a year, to retain on his retirement a pension of £6,000. Why, the President of the United States only received a salary of £5,000 a year. The noble Lord at the head of the Government had only £5,000 a year. What had the public done for that noble Lord, in a pecuniary point of view, whose services to the country were infinitely superior compared with those of any of the Bishops. The Pope of Rome received for his personal expenditure only £1,500 a year. The Cardinals of Rome received but £400 a year, and the Roman Catholic Bishops in this country, who worked in a way that an English Bishop worked, received but £500 a year. Notwithstanding that, this right rev. Gentleman, who was now in possession of such a territory and in the receipt of such an income as he had just stated, called upon the House to stipulate with him that he should receive £6,000 a year as a retiring pension. The right rev. Gentleman once held the bishopric of Chester the income of which was £3,000 a year. He held it for four years, and was then translated to the see of London, which he had held for twenty-eight years. Four years at £3,000 would make £12,000, and twenty-eight years at £22,000 would make £616,000, amounting together to the sum of £628,000. That was the sum which had been given to the Bishop of London, beside the patronage he enjoyed, consisting of no less than ninety-seven livings, and which were reported to be worth £70,000 a year. He wished particularly to call the attention of the House to this fact, that all this worldly wealth was at the disposal of a disciple of Christ—the Divine Minister of Mercy, who came into the world ushered in a manger, and who died on the cross—who wrought miracles to raise tribute money, and whose great disciple Paul worked with his own hands, that he might not be a charge to any man. With respect to the Bishop of Durham, he had enjoyed an income of £5,000 a year as Bishop of Chichester for five years; and his present income was £16,000 a year. He had held his see for twenty years, so that he had received altogether a sum of £345,000. The Act of Parliament relating to the incomes of the Bishops fixed the amount of the Bishop of Durham at £8,000; but, in fact, the receipts of that right rev. Prelate had, by some unexplained means, doubled that amount. These two Bishops had together received a sum of £973,000 besides the patronage attached to their bishoprics. Such an enormous sum was an amount unparalleled in the history of the world. These two Bishops had received nearly £1,000,000 of the revenue of the Church, while there were 10,000 clergymen of that very Church each receiving a sum not exceeding £100 per annum. Now, he would ask was such a state of things to be endured by the House of Commons or by the people of this country? But besides such large incomes and the immense amount of patronage, the Bishops were allowed a seat in the House of Peers. That he conceived to be an injustice to the country. Not only did those Bishops exercise their own rights as Members of the House of Lords, but they acted, by virtue of their spiritual character, as a most influential power over the minds of the lay Lords in that assembly. It was, therefore, wrong and unjust that Bishops should have a seat in that House. Those were serious matters for the House to consider. Did the House suppose that their debates were not read? Did they not believe that the charge of simony would be believed in by millions of Her Majesty's subjects? Would not the fact of these two right rev. Prelates, after having received nearly £1,000,000 from the State, and coming to the House and asking for retiring pensions to the amount of £10,500 a year, be canvassed in every pothouse in the country, and be made the subject of the song of the scoffer and the mockery of the drunkard? It was a happiness to know that there were men, even in the Church itself, who lamented such a state of things; while there were men, without the Church, of the largest minds and who had ever trod in the footsteps of their Divine Master, labouring for a pittance, before whom those two right rev. Prelates would be made to bow their diminished heads. Was either of those two Prelates to be compared with Robert Hall, with Dr. Pye Smith, or with Dr. Robert Newton? He could not allow the Bill to pass without expressing to the House what he believed to be a strong prevailing sentiment on the part of a vast majority of the people, and he warned the House to be prepared for the time when that sentiment would be enforced by much abler men than himself. He begged to record his opinion against a measure which he deemed odious; which he believed to be injurious to the country, to strike at the very root of all religious sentiment, and calculated to destroy the Church itself. To the honour of the Colonies of this kingdom, he could say that no one of them had followed the example of this country in forming a Church Establishment; and it was time that the Church should set its affairs in order, for such was the force of public opinion on this question that it would be impossible for that Church to stand against it.

MR. NEWDEGATE, in seconding the Amendment, said, he very much regretted that such severe remarks should have been indulged in by the hon. Member for Sheffield. He considered that the Bishop of London had dispensed his revenue with a most liberal hand. It was, however, with much pain that he (Mr. Newdegate) voted against the second reading of the Bill, but he did so conscientiously, feeling that if the measure passed it would establish a precedent which would work the greatest possible detriment to the Church of England. The Bishops of this country ought not to be left in such a position as either to be obliged to retain their bishoprics after the state of their health made it irksome to them to discharge their duties; or to make a bargain with the Prime Minister for the time being in order to secure them from being left destitute. It was the general feeling among churchmen that that state of things rendered the Bishops subservient to the Minister of the day. Either the present Bill ought to be made an exceptional measure, or it ought to be a precedent for future legislation. He would, therefore, ask the noble Lord whether it was his intention in the course of the next Session to introduce a Bill of a general nature to provide for all retiring Bishops who were incapacitated by infirmity or age? His opinion was, that there ought to be a legal provision made for the retirement of the Bishops, which they might claim after proving before a competent tribunal that they were incapacitated from discharging their duties.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House will, upon this day three months, resolve itself into the said Committee," instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

THE MARQUESS OF BLANDFORD said, he was most anxious to impress upon the noble Lord at the head of the Government the immense importance of acceding to the suggestion of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate)—to give a pledge that in the next Session a general measure on the subject should be introduced—because he could not conceive anything more prejudicial to the interests of the Church, or more calculated to discredit the character of the episcopate, than that upon every occasion of the retirement of a Bishop it should be necessary to pass a special measure. No one rejoiced more than himself in the connection between Church and State, but he thought that so close a political relationship with the State was really humiliating to the Church; and, seeing how aspersions had been cast in the course of the discussion on the characters and the acts of the Bishops of London and Durham, he could not suppose that, henceforth, any Prelate, however anxious he might be to surrender the responsibilities and the duties of his office, would venture to face the difficulties and annoyances incidental to special legislation. He supported the second reading of the Bill because the disadvantages of not passing it were greater, in his opinion, than those of passing it. It was impossible the diocese of London could continue in its present state, and the appointment of suffragans or coadjutors would not, he apprehended, meet the necessities of the case. Parliament had fixed the income of the future Bishop of London at £10,000 per annum for the entire performance of the duties; and if the measure now before the House did not pass they would leave a prelate in the see enjoying £18,000 or £20,000 a year, incapable of performing any of the duties. He regarded that as a conclusive argument in favour of the Bill. It had also been remarked that, after payment of the retiring pension, there would be a gain of £5,000 a year. The anomalous position of Church property might not be recollected. Parliament had sanctioned a mode of dealing with leases by enfranchisement, whereby the value of Church estates might be doubled. But the action rested with prelates and dignitaries, who were debarred, by their incomes being fixed, from obtaining any advantage from enfranchisement. Upon a vacancy in the see of London the estates would be transferred to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, who were interested in promoting enfranchisement, and the effect of the Bill would really be to give a much larger increase than £5,000 a year to the funds of the Commissioners. An appeal which he had made on a former occasion to the noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston) to put in force the Act of Henry VIII. might, at first sight, appear inconsistent with his support of the Bill now under consideration, but the two courses were perfectly compatible, because there might be cases for absolute retirement, as in this matter of the Bishops of London and Durham, and cases of Bishops, in full possession of health and strength, so overburdened with work as to be extremely glad to obtain the assistance of suffragans. He still, however, retained his opinion that great advantage would be gained from putting in force the Act of Henry VIII. It would not supersede a measure of retirement, and a measure of retirement would not supersede it. He hoped the present measure would be the prelude to a general one, and that the noble Lord would employ the recess in preparing a scheme which should be applicable to the general wants of the Church and for ever set at rest this most important question.

MR. MOWBRAY said, he also wished to add his appeal to that of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire, that the noble Lord would pledge Her Majesty's Government, if they should continue in office, to introduce a general measure on the subject in the next Session. A great deal had been said as to whether the Bill before them should form a precedent or not. In one respect he hoped it would. In other respects he hoped it would not. It was a valuable precedent, inasmuch as for three centuries since the Reformation there had been no instance of the resignation of a Bishop; but at the same time he must confess that he did not wish to see the details followed in a general measure. He did not complain of the amount of the retiring pensions, because, when they looked at the amount of the incomes those Bishops had enjoyed, it was nothing more than reasonable that their retiring pensions should in some degree accord with their previous incomes. If a general measure had been brought in, the bishoprics of London and Durham must have been dealt with as exceptional instances. That, therefore, was an answer to any complaint for not bringing in a general measure in the present Session; but, with regard to any general measure in a future Session, he hoped it would not be such as they might expect from the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir J. Graham), who regarded the present state of the diocese of Durham, part of the duties of which were performed by the Bishop of Manchester, as "satisfactory." [Sir J. GRAHAM: I said tolerably satisfactory.] He thought, however, that the right hon. Baronet would not be disposed to describe the condition of the diocese of Durham as tolerably satisfactory, if, on his return to his constituents, he visited Durham and some of the more distant parts of Northumberland. He did not wish to reflect upon the imperfect superintendence of a Prelate bowed down by age and infirmities, but the argument of the right hon. Baronet was, he considered, extremely dangerous to the Church. It was now only eight years since Parliament created the see of Manchester. [Sir J. GRAHAM: Thirty years.] He thought the see was appointed in 1848, but however that might be, Parliament had assigned an income of between £4,000 and £5,000 a year to the see of Manchester, and was entitled to expect that the Bishop would devote the whole of his time to discharge the duties of his own diocese.

To say that the Bishop of Manchester had time to place at the disposition of the Bishop of Durham was, without doubt, one of the strongest arguments which could be used against episcopacy. That such would be the general feature of any measure the right hon. Baronet might introduce was apparent from the fact, that the right hon. Baronet had pointed out how, in the dead and torpid state of the Church which prevailed in the reign of George I., a Bishop of Rochester administered, without scandal or inconvenience, the see of London; and how, in 1843, the Bishop of Salisbury performed the duties of the diocese of Bath and Wells during the incapacity of Bishop Law. They were told that at the present time several other Prelates were incapacitated by illness, and the inference from the cases cited was, that the healthy Bishops were to perform the duties between them. No argument, he asserted, could be more dangerous to the Church or inconsistent in itself. The hon. Baronet the Member for the University of Oxford (Sir W. Heathcote) said the relations between a Bishop and his clergy should be of a close, intimate, affectionate, and personal character; but how could that be expected if his duties were performed in the most rapid and perfunctory manner possible by a Bishop coming for the purpose from a distant diocese. He trusted, therefore, whatever the measure might be which Her Majesty's Ministers would introduce, it would not be founded on the views of the right hon. Baronet (Sir J. Graham). He hoped that the question of the subdivision of the bishoprics would not be overlooked. He believed there had been a recommendation, on authority, that subdivision should take place in both these dioceses. He had only that morning formed one of a deputation which waited on the noble Lord at the head of the Government to urge the subdivision of the diocese of London. He hoped that when bringing in a general measure for the retirement of Bishops, the Government would introduce some other measure for the extension of the episcopate, and he inferred that, there was some such intention from the concluding clause of the Bill under consideration, which provided that the new Bishop of London and the new Bishop of Durham should take their sees subject to any arrangement Parliament might make during the next three years relative to those dioceses. He must express his astonishment at the opposition which had sprung up against the Bill, and, although he had listened with attention to the arguments which came from right hon. Gentlemen exercising great authority in that House, those arguments appeared to him to be extremely technical. The opposition of the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Hadfield) was more reasonable, because he was opposed to episcopacy altogether, but, without following the hon. Gentleman into the lengthened disquisition by which he intended to show that there were Nonconformist divines with whom the divines of the Church of England could not compare, he would express his earnest desire that the House would support Her Majesty's Ministers in applying a practical remedy to a gross and glaring evil.

SIR JOHN FITZGERALD said, he was opposed to the Bill, considering it one of exclusion. It granted retiring pensions to two right rev. Prelates, both of whom were in receipt of immense incomes quite adequate to provide for themselves and their families. It appeared these two right rev. Prelates had sent a statement to the effect that from age and infirmities they were rendered incapable of performing their duties, and therefore on receiving a certain amount of annuities they were willing to retire. But, he would ask, were not the working clergy equally liable to various infirmities as the two right rev. Prelates? yet not one word was mentioned of providing retiring pensions for them—certainly the most laborious body in the Church. Another objection to the Bill was the very nature of it—a proposition coming from the two right rev. Prelates, stating on what terms they were willing to retire and give up their bishoprics; and what was the construction placed on such a proposal? Several of the learned Members of the House, during the debate, had declared that they considered such a mode of proceeding as amounting to simony; and he, therefore, hoped the noble Lord the First Minister of the Crown would pause and not persevere in attempting to pass the Bill. They had heard much of the "faith of a Christian" lately in that House, and they ought also, he thought, to bear in mind Christian charity, and not make such a Bill as the one now proposed an exclusive one, but have a regular scale of retiring pensions for all classes of the clergy drawn out—which, he was certain, would not only give general satisfaction to the country, but would also be of real service to the Church of England.

MR. HILDYARD said, great wealth appertained to the See of Durham, and he recollected that much discontent was occasioned when a portion of that wealth was appropriated to the legitimate purpose of increasing small livings. The suggestion of the hon. Member (Mr. Mowbray), if carried out, would bring back that wealth, and, therefore, persons interested in the diocese had strong motives for urging the appointment of two or three more Bishops. The present Bill provided pensions out of the Ecclesiastical Common Fund, without injury to that fund; but as soon as those lives fell in that would not be the case, and he must protest against trenching upon the "Common Fund" for the retiring pensions of Bishops, because it was at present wholly inadequate to provide for the working clergy. He would remind the House what had occurred with respect to the retirement of Irish Judges. There was no class of functionaries looked upon with so much consideration as the Judges. But it was not so with the Bishops. Religious prejudices and animosities were excited and made imperative the utmost precautions, so that on the one hand, they should not cling to place after they ought to resign for the purpose of throwing the patronage of appointing their successors into the hands of their political friends; and, on the other, that an unscrupulous minority should not be enabled to compel them to resign when they were fully equal to the discharge of their duties. He hoped Parliament would not be considered as represented by the small number of persons now present, and that when a general measure was introduced they might be allowed to freely discuss it upon its own merits. Although he disapproved of the Bill, and should be glad to throw it out, he would suggest that, after the strong expression of the opinion of the House in the division yesterday, the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Hadfield) would do no good by persevering with his Amendment.

MR. MOWBRAY said, he must beg to explain that he wished the see of Durham to be so divided as to give a Bishop to Northumberland, with which county he had no connection or interest. He was in favour of the appointment of two or three more Bishops for the whole of England.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he was very well aware that the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Hadfield) was a most determined enemy to the Church Establishment, and, as the hon. Member was of opinion that this Bill would be most detrimental to the interests of the Established Church, he thought he might, on the hon. Gentleman's own showing, claim his support. If the hon. Member really thought the Bill would have the effect which he ascribed to it he ought to divide with the Government in its favour, and vote against his own Amendment. He could not express himself in clearer terms than those of the hon. Member for Durham (Mr. Mowbray) upon the point, that even if a general measure had been proposed they must have had a clause making exceptional provision for these two sees in question, because it was only fair and just that the proportion of retiring allowance should be calculated, not according to the reduced incomes which those Prelates had never received, but according to the incomes which they had been in the receipt of. Any general rule must therefore be subject to those exceptions. As to what might be the intentions of Her Majesty's Government with regard to a general measure he was not at the present moment prepared to state them, but he was quite prepared to say that if the Government proposed a general measure next Session they would do it upon their own responsibility, and that nothing which had passed in the course of the debates would preclude hon. Gentlemen from considering the measure upon its own merits. At the same time, with respect to the topic on which the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Hildyard) had dwelt—namely, his objection to any arrangement by which retiring allowances were placed on the "Common Fund," because he considered that fund ought to be devoted to the general interests of the Church by the increase of small livings. Now, the interests of the Church lay in more directions than one, and although it might be the interest of the Church to give adequate stipends to parochial clergymen, yet, it undoubtedly was greatly to the interest of the Church that the duties of the episcopacy should be effectively performed, and in the case in which a Bishop by age or infirmity was unable to perform those duties it was the interest of the Church to supply his place by an active and efficient Bishop. He only mentioned that to show that much could be said both ways, and that the House might not run off with the conclusion that no answer could be made to the argument of the hon. and learned Member. With regard to the method of supplying the places of infirm Bishops, he had no hesitation in stating that his own opinion was very much the same as the hon. Gentleman's (Mr. Mowbray's), that the arrangement of the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir J. Graham) would not be a good one. His opinion was—subject, of course, to the better opinion of the House—that if they were obliged by peculiar circumstances to relieve from duty an aged and infirm Bishop, it would be a bad arrangement to place under or over him, but in the diocese with him, an episcopal office, not having all that weight and authority which belonged to the actual possessor of the see. In his opinion, in that case they ought to get a clear see and appoint another Bishop, on whom the responsibility would be undivided, just as if a vacancy had occurred. He quite agreed with the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Hildyard) that retirement ought not to depend either upon the simple will of the Bishop or upon the discretion of the Government of the day. They ought to endeavour to find some independent authority which, having the interests of the Church at heart, and not being connected with the Government of the day, should determine in the two cases whether the Bishop wishing to retire was really by physical infirmities incompetent, or whether the Bishop, unwilling to retire, but evidently incompetent by physical infirmities, should not be obliged to retire. He thought it was quite right that that decision should not rest with the Government of the day, because any arrangement they might make would certainly be open to animadversion and the imputation of motives, to which, although persons who understood the political affairs of the country knew the Government were not really liable, yet it was undesirable the Government should be exposed. He therefore thought that, if there were a general measure, some such arrangement as he had suggested ought to be adopted. He was willing to admit that these partial measures were objectionable, because they raised discussion upon personal questions connected with dignitaries of the Church, to which it was unfair to expose them; but, without giving any pledge that the Government would be able to frame a fit measure, if they did propose any general measure it must be considered as the measure of the Government, and no one would be committed to approval of it by anything which might pass on the present occasion.

MR. HENLEY said, he thought that the answer of the noble Lord threw some light on the course which the Government would probably take next Session on this subject. He congratulated the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General on the task which he had undertaken, to form some kind of tribunal to decide on some general principle as to the claims of right rev. Prelates wishing to retire. The noble Lord had made up his mind so far, that he thought when the Bishop became unfit for duty he should be removed. He was quite of opinion with the noble Lord that it would be inconvenient to leave the decision of such matters to the Government for the time being. The noble Lord seemed also to have made up his mind as to the insufficiency of appointing suffragan Bishops. The hon. Member for Durham (Mr. Mowbray) had commented on the strange course which had been taken in opposition to the Bill by Members who had always been regarded as the friends of the Church. But he would call the attention of the hon. Member to the fact, that the Bill proposed a novel mode of dealing with Church dignitaries, and that they who had opposed it were desirous of adhering to the established rules of the Church. He agreed with the noble Lord, that episcopal wants ought to be supplied as well as parochial wants. The noble Lord had commented on the observations of his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Hildyard), who had entered his protest against trenching on the "Common Fund" to supply retiring allowances to Bishops; but the noble Lord seemed to forget that there was no "Common Fund" for the parochial clergyman to fall back upon if he became unfit for duty, either for a retiring allowance or for the support of a curate. If they were to act on a general principle, he saw no justice in providing for the pensions of Bishops out of the "Common Fund," while the parochial clergyman was left to support himself out of his own means. He was glad to hear that the noble Lord did not consider any one pledged as to future legislation on the subject.

MR. KINNAIRD said, that although he was not favourable to excessive episcopal incomes, and though he had objected to many things the Bishop of London had done, he could not let the criticisms of the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Hadfield) pass without notice. He believed Dr. Blomfield had administered the revenues of the see with great liberality.

During his episcopacy he had consecrated not fewer than 200 new churches; and he had built and endowed one of them entirely at his own cost.

MR. PELLATT said, that, though a Nonconformist, he had voted for the second reading of the Bill, because it was a question of State, and he felt it his duty to support the Government in doing what was best to be done under the circumstances. He hoped that in framing any general measure the noble Lord would not overlook the propriety of removing the Bishops from the House of Lords.

MR. HADFIELD said, he would withdraw his Amendment.

Clause 1.

MR. GLADSTONE said, that, retaining all his objections to the Bill, and deeming it to be highly indecent that the House should be called upon within five or six days to pass the measure, yet, judging from the division of last night, that the House would not concur with him in that matter, he should confine himself on the present occasion to proposing an Amendment, with a view of embodying his protest against what he conceived to be the objectionable nature of the Bill. The hon. Member for Durham (Mr. Mowbray) had expressed great astonishment with regard to the course which had been taken by hon. Gentlemen who had opposed the Bill. The hon. Gentleman said that they ought to have done directly the reverse. His hon. Friend, no doubt, had arrived, with great satisfaction to himself, at that conclusion; but when he had devoted to public business as many years as those who had at present given four, five, six, and seven times as many years to the business of the public as he had, he would perhaps be less ready to express his surprise at the course which had been pursued. His hon. Friend had said that nothing but technical objections had been taken; but he (Mr. Gladstone) must tell his hon. Friend that one of the great dangers of the period in which they lived, and the most besetting sin of that House, was a disposition to live, in respect to legislation, from hand to mouth, and to make provisions for the moment and the hour, and then to call that practical legislation. When they were invited to direct their attention either to the general principles of the law, or to remote and ulterior consequences, they were told that these were mere technical objections. Now, he would ask hon. Members if it was a mere technical objection to consider the terms on which the resignation of a bishopric or of a benefice was made—whether it was made in connection with some emolument or not? However, his present object was to move an Amendment, for the purpose of recording his objection to this pecuniary bargain, which he considered to run counter to the common law of all Christendom. No answer had been given to the argument of the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Napier), that the resignation of a spiritual office on a bargain for the receipt of money, as an essential condition for resigning, was simony. He challenged contradiction to that proposition, and he felt bolder in so doing in consequence of the able arguments of the right hon. and learned Gentleman. It was the bargain of the individual, it was the making the receipt of money a condition of resigning a spiritual office, which constituted the offence of simony. His opinion was, that no general measure would have given a sanction to any particular bargain; but it would have been perfectly easy to avoid any difficulty on that point. He entertained strong objections to making a particular bargain, and he believed his noble Friend at the head of the Government had fairly admitted, to a certain extent, those objections. He should, therefore, move that, instead of the words, “accept the resignation of his see by the said Charles James Lord Bishop of London,” there be inserted, “accept the resignation of his see by any Bishop of his province.”

SIR GEORGE GREY said, the object of his right hon. Friend was to make the Act a general Act, instead of it being a particular Act, confined to two cases only. The first objection to such a proposition was, that no measure of the kind could be passed during the present Session. If his right hon. Friend enforced his Amendment, it would in fact negative the Bill.

MR. MOWBRAY said, he was sorry to have incurred the censure of his right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Oxford. He certainly thought that when the Bishops of London and Durham were about to surrender two-thirds of their income, they were setting an example of which no one could disapprove. He considered it to be an act of great disinterestedness on the part of those right rev. Prelates, and that no corrupt motive could be assigned to them. He therefore did think that the argument concerning simony was of a strictly technical character, and he still remained of that opinion.

SIR JAMES GRAHAM said, he wished to ask the noble Lord at the head of the Government whether the letter from the Bishop of Durham, bearing date the 21st of June, was the first communication which had passed between that Prelate and the Government? It was known that the Bishop of Durham first intimated to the Government in November last, his intention to resign upon terms which had reference to the amount of income to be provided for him on his resignation. He therefore wished to ask whether the letter of the 21st of June, 1856, in which the Bishop stipulated for an annual allowance of £4,500, was the first communication that had passed between him and the Government with reference to the amount to be allowed to him on his retirement? His reasons for putting the question so distinctly was, that he wished to know whether the Bishop of Durham had not in the first instance required a larger sum, and whether the Government did not object to propose to Parliament a larger sum, and whether, after much communication with regard to the amount, this letter of the 21st of June was ultimately the result of frequent communications between the Bishop and the Government, and that the Government at last consented to recommend £4,500 as the maximum amount to be provided for the Bishop?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I beg, Sir, to say that I shall feel very glad to answer the question of my right hon. Friend since it has been put, though I must say that this is the first time I have heard of the circumstances which have been referred to. It is perfectly true that in the course of last autumn, or rather shortly before the Christmas holidays, I was informed verbally that the Bishop of Durham wished to resign. I took those steps upon that communication which I thought to be necessary, having then an intention of bringing forward a measure relating to these cases. But after a certain period I was informed, from the same quarter, that the Bishop of Durham no longer wished to resign; therefore the matter dropped. The first communication made to me by the Bishop was by letter. It may be, and very possibly was, the fact, that some days before that letter was actually written a verbal communication was made to me on the point; but this I do state—that at no time was any larger sum proposed than what has been mentioned, nor was there any communication or negotiation such as has been talked of, or any objection made by me to any larger sum than that which is mentioned in the Bill.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, that with regard to the Bishop of London, information from a source which he knew to be correct had reached him, that on the part of that right rev. Prelate no proposition of any kind had been made by him, except what was contained in the correspondence.

MR. EVELYN DENISON said, he very much regretted, now that they had got into Committee, that their attention should have been directed to matters not strictly before them. With respect to the Amendment, he doubted whether, if the proposed words were introduced, it would not be necessary to recast the whole Bill. He thought it would be impossible to transform the present Bill into a general measure, and he should therefore vote against the Amendment.

MR. HENLEY said, he did not think the words proposed to be left out would by any means have the effect of making the Bill a general Bill; nor did he believe that, if the Amendment were agreed to, the other clauses of the Bill would require recasting. The only effect of the Amendment would be that no special cause of resignation would be shown.

MR. GLADSTONE said, the hon. Member for Malton (Mr. E. Denison) was quite mistaken in supposing that the adoption of the Amendment would make it necessary to change the other clauses of the Bill. The principle he wished to lay down was, that the law of resignation should be a general law. The Bill did not authorise resignation, it only recognised resignation.

MR. NAPIER said, the Bill, if amended as proposed, would not give the two Bishops any new power to resign which they did not already possess by law; and a great portion of his objection to the measure would therefore be removed. The Bill would be simply a measure to make a pecuniary provision for two Bishops who had unconditionally surrendered their sees.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, in consequence of indisposition, he had not had the opportunity of expressing an opinion upon the Bill on a previous discussion, he therefore hoped the Committee would bear with him while he made a few remarks on the measure. It was not a subject on which he would venture to offer an opinion without much consideration. He deeply deplored that any observations should have been made to the effect that if the Bill were carried an imputation of simony would attach to the right rev. Prelates whose names were connected with it. That ought not to have been stated by any one who could not conscientiously aver that he was perfectly well informed upon the subject of the law and conversant with ecclesiastical proceedings. He ventured to say, with great humility, but with much confidence, that any man who would devote an hour to ecclesiastical history, or to ascertain what were the ecclesiastical duties of the Bishops—which any man might do who would look through the Statutes—would be perfectly convinced that what was now proposed to be done was in strict conformity with the law of the Church, and in strict conformity with the municipal and conventional law of simony, which was all that they were bound to recognise. Now, what was the practice of the Church in ancient times? He would read what was the history of the resignation of the Bishop of Durham in the fourteenth century. He quoted from Strype's History of the Life and Acts of Archbishop Grindal:—

“Purificatione Beate Mariæ imminente, Episcopus Dunelmensis Nicolaus, sentiens se auctorem valetudinarium, et infirmum, &c., Episcopatum suum Dunelmensem, obtenta tali à Domino Papa licentiâ, resignavit,—[hon Members should observe the peculiar phraseology of what follows]—et datis ad hoc provisoribus, Archiepiscopo Eboracensi et Londinensi et Wigornensi Episcopis assignata sunt ei tria maneria,—viz., de Hoveden cum pertinentiis, Stoctuna et Esingtuna. Recedens igitur à Dunelmo, acceptâ ibidem à fratribus licentiâ ad alterutrum dictorum maneriorum mansurus, perrexit, ut in pace ibidem, sine querelarum vel causarum strepitu, exutus à sollicitudinibus mundanis, sibi jam expectanti donec ejus veniret immutatio, liberius orationi vacaret, &c.”

It might not be unworthy the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. Gladstone) to consider in what way objections to arrangements for retiring Bishops were met in those days:—

“Adulatores quidam pessimi cupientes placere Dunelmensi Episcopo Waltero, petierunt à Papa Episcopatum vel reintegrari, vel saltem minus damnificari. Quibus Papa. Miramur super his Nonne facta fuit distributio illa, et partitio per magnam deliberationem et considerationem virorum peritorum, et consensum partium; et res jam confirmata est per nos, et regem Angliæ, & per provisos. Et sic repulsi sunt accusantes cum probis.”

There was another case—the case of Archbishop Grindal. He was Archbishop of Canterbury in the reign of Elizabeth, and, being blind, was incapable of performing the duties of his office. The Queen sent the Lord Treasurer to him, and, after an interview, the Lord Treasurer sent a message to some person attending about the Queen :—

“ To inform Her Majesty at his leisure, that the Archbishop was now ready at Lady Day, being the end of the half year allotted him, to resign his bishopric, to be conferred by her upon some other, to enter into actual government of the Church of England, which sustained, he said, great lack for present action. That he yielded himself to Her Majesty's goodness to have some pension during his short life, which he (the Treasurer) wished to be great and honourable, although it should be to the successor burdensome for the present. But he that should have it must shape his garment with his cloth for the time. That he had seen into the value of the Archbishop's possessions, and found them to be about £2,780 per annum, according to the rate of the book of first-fruits. That he had also seen the particular books of the annual receipts, which grew somewhat, but not much, above ; and if the then Archbishop might have £700 or £800 a year pension, he thought his successor with good husbandry might make the rest to be £2,000.”

[Mr. GLADSTONE: What is the book you are quoting from ?] The passage is from Strype's Life of Archbishop Grindal. The Archbishop made two petitions to Her Majesty, that she would grant him the house at Croydon, and

“ This he signified to his Friend the Lord Treasurer, showing him that in all resignations of Bishops, so far as he had read or heard, there had been always one house at the least, pertaining to the see, assigned to the resigner, as partly might appear by a note which he sent him, taken out of the history of Mathew Paris.”

The other petition was—

“ That he might not be called to trouble after his resignation for dilapidations. From which, as he was informed by the learned in the laws, he was by law upon a resignation excused. Notwithstanding, although he did not distrust the equity of his successor, yet because he had been so much troubled with suits for dilapidations, he was fearful. And therefore prayed, that he might have some good assistance if the case should so require.”

It was so arranged that the House at Croydon should be given, and also freedom from dilapidations ; and these conditions were recited in the deed of resignation which was prepared. The deed was not completed, because the good old Archbishop died before the arrangement could be carried into effect ; but no one in those days—and they knew the law of simony just as well as lawyers did now—ever dreamt that Archbishop Grindal was open to the charge of simony. The hon. Baronet the Member for the University of Oxford (Sir W. Heathcote) referred to the statute 26 Hen. VIII., chap. iii. Whoever looked at the 21st, 22nd, and 23rd sections of that Act would find that in every case of resignation by a Bishop, Abbot, or Dean, it was competent to the ordinary to assign a pension to the retiring dignitary, to be paid out of the revenue of the succeeding Bishop, Abbot, or Dean, and in some particular cases the statute provided that the pension should not exceed a limited amount. That particular statute was not in the smallest degree interfered with by 31 Eliz. The Act of Elizabeth struck only at corrupt resignations and pensions, which were the result of corrupt bargains. The consequence was, that by the law, as embodied in the statute of Henry VIII., and confirmed by the statute of Anne, it was competent to give pensions upon resignations, and, but for some difficulties in the manner and form of carrying these resignations into effect, there would have been no necessity to come to Parliament at all ; but inasmuch as there had been no resignation of a bishopric since the time of the Reformation, there would be a difficulty, no doubt, in understanding accurately in what form to carry the law into effect ; and it had therefore been thought best to bring in the Bill now before the House. He was surprised that a right rev. Prelate in another place (the Bishop of Oxford) should not only have objected to the Bill on the ground of simony, but also, he stated, because it was a privilegium introduced for the first time, and unknown to the law of the land. Now, that objection only showed that no man should deal in those observations whose knowledge of the subject was not so complete as to render it perfectly sure he could maintain them. It was said this was a corrupt bargain on the part of the Bishop of London and the Bishop of Durham. The words of the ecclesiastical law were that resignation should be spontè simpliciter et absolutè. He contended, then, that these resignations accurately fulfilled that interpretation that everything was done in facie ecclesie, and that there could not be the slightest ground for imputing a corrupt bargain to those Prelates. It was said that the Bishops offered to resign upon conditions ; but he could not imagine a more perverse view of the question. The letter of the Bishop of London was merely to this effect—that he was desirous of receiving a provision for old age, and if it were allowed by law he would accept it; that if the law gave it to him, or if the law would give it to him, then he desired it. Was there any corruption in a man saying he desired to do nothing more than what the law authorised or should authorise? And when hon. Members spoke of a contract by the Government, they should remember that the arrangement made by his noble Friend the First Minister of the Crown was nothing more than that, if the existing law did not meet the case, a Bill should be brought in for the purpose. He trusted his right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Oxford would give him credit for speaking with perfect sincerity when he expressed his belief that he had laid before the House the true grounds on which a legal decision of the question could be arrived at. Sound reason and good sense would be sufficient, even if the question would not stand the test of the law; but he believed it would stand the test of law and of ecclesiastical usage. He believed that the provisions of the Bill were framed in complete conformity with what the law was upon the subject, and in complete conformity with ecclesiastical precedent and the usage of former times. The right hon. Gentleman had read somewhere that simony was bargaining. It was so; but it meant corrupt bargaining—the receiving money or other consideration—and the right hon. Gentleman had taken the naked proposition without its proper interpretation. If they altered the first clause in the way proposed, they must alter the Bill altogether, in a manner unquestionably not contemplated when leave was given to bring in a Bill to provide for the retirement of the Bishops of London and Durham.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he was sorry to interfere with his hon. and learned Friend, but as the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman was addressed to him he trusted the Committee would allow him to say a few words in reply. His hon. and learned Friend said he would not pronounce a syllable of censure, and though he had not pronounced censure explicitly, he had come as near to it as possible with the interpretation he had put on the words repulsi accusatores cum probis. If there were any probra in this matter to whom did they belong? He thought he should prove that they did not rest upon him. The hon. and learned Solicitor General produced a book, which, by his learning and accomplishments—and no Solicitor General ever possessed greater talents and greater accomplishments—he had been enabled to discover, and from the extracts he had read he wished the Committee to believe he had convicted his opponents of gross ignorance, because, he said, any man who gave an hour to an examination of the law of the Church must have seen that the Bill before the Committee was perfectly conformable to the law, that the objections were nought, and that the accusatores ought to be repulsed cum probis. But what would the Committee think when he assured them that the cases quoted by the Solicitor General did not touch the matter in dispute in the slightest degree. The hon. and learned Gentleman had conveyed a perfectly untrue impression as to the character of the two cases. Now, what was the point of issue between him and his hon. and learned Friend? Had he ever said that it was improper to assign maintenance to persons who resign bishoprics? Did not the hon. Member for Finsbury (Mr. T. Duncombe), representing a somewhat rigid rule with regard to the retirement of Bishops, and, at any rate, not taking a too favourable view of the case—did he not say that these Bishops ought to have resigned unconditionally and thrown themselves on the generosity of Parliament? His hon. and learned Friend's indisposition must not only have prevented his hearing the debate yesterday, but of knowing what was said, for if he had read what had been said in that House he could not have fallen into the gross error which he had displayed. The point at issue was not whether it was lawful to assign pensions. Who had ever said that a Bishop, if he resigned his bishopric, ought to starve? It was perfectly plain that provision ought to be made for a Bishop who resigned his bishopric, but the question was—and had the hon. and learned Gentleman exhibited only a hundredth part of the acuteness he was known to possess he must have known it—whether they ought to have, or had they ever had, an individual bargain for the resignation of a bishopric in which an engagement to receive a pension was made the condition of resignation, and without which condition the resignation was not to take place. The hon. and learned Gentleman produced two cases from Strype's Life of Archbishop Grindal to show the folly and inutility of the proceedings of his opponents.

To support the doctrine he laid down the hon. and learned Gentleman quoted the case of a Bishop of Durham, and said it was perfectly plain there was no bargain in that case, for the words were, "sentiens se annosum, valetudinarium, et infirmum, &c., Episcopatum suum Dunelmensem, obtentâ tali à Domino Papa licentiâ, resignavit." Had it been that this Bishop had said he would resign if the Pope or the Archbishop would give him a pension, the case would have been parallel; but the "resignavit" preceded the words "et datis ad hoc provisoribus." The pension was provided by the will of the Pope, and when complaint was made, not of any bargain, but that too large a provision was made to the injury of the successor in the see, that complaint was found to be groundless, and the accusers were repulsed cum probis. So much for the case of the Bishop of Durham. He did not think the hon. and learned Gentleman would return to that case; at any rate, he distinctly gave him the challenge that there was not one syllable in the recital upon the subject of bargain; and the bargain here was the whole question. The precedent quoted had no more to do with it than with the question of Magna Charta. Then there was the case of Archbishop Grindal. He had not had an opportunity of examining fully into it, but, so far as he had been able to look into that case upon the instant, and so far as his recollection served, as to the peculiar circumstances attending the resignation of Archbishop Grindal, he thought it did not make one bit more in favour of the hon. and learned Gentleman's argument than did the case of the worthy old Bishop of Durham that he had quoted. Archbishop Grindal never voluntarily resigned at all. He was particularly obnoxious to Queen Elizabeth. Queen Elizabeth considered him a very bad Archbishop of Canterbury, and so strong was her opinion, that she actually suspended him from the discharge of his duties altogether. He was not quite certain whether that suspension continued to the end of his life or not—perhaps he might have resumed the administration of the see. At any rate he continued in possession of the see; but Queen Elizabeth signified her pleasure to Archbishop Grindal that he should resign, and the signification of the pleasure of Queen Elizabeth, he need not say, was more full of meaning than anything which proceeded from him, or even anything which proceeded from his hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General. There was no doubt that the whole meaning, purport, and significance of the communication from Queen Elizabeth was that he should resign. That was the basis of the whole transaction; but did Archbishop Grindal, or did he not, write to the Minister and say he was ready to resign, or did he write and say that he was ready to resign upon the assurance that he should have a pension?—for it was admitted that it was perfectly justifiable and honourable for a Bishop to ask for maintenance during the remainder of his life, and that was the outside of what Archbishop Grindal did. In his petition he apologised for not having offered to resign before, and then he continued—

"These were the considerations which hitherto had stayed him from offering of this resignation of his place. But now, knowing Her Majesty's mind, he would do it with all his heart; and would prepare himself accordingly to satisfy her pleasure, hoping for her favour, which he esteemed above all worldly things; trusting yet, and humbly praying, that by his lordship's means she would permit and tolerate him to continue in place till a little after Michaelmas next, when the audit of the see was kept for the whole year; that he might see some end of his said suits, the finishing of his school, and the multitude of his poor servants provided for; meaning in the meantime, both by his officers and himself, by God's grace, to have a vigilant care for the good government and well ordering of his cure. In which time he should also be more able to make a perfect account of all things, to the satisfaction of his successor.

There was nothing in his petition of a bargain for so much per annum. The Archbishop said he was ready to resign. He stipulated only for provision for his poor servants, to finish some matters in hand, and to give a more perfect account of all things.

"And after that time he would be most ready, with all humble thanks to Her Majesty, to resign his place unto Her Highness's disposition. Which favour he wished to obtain by the interest of him, the Lord Treasurer."

Then came a passage which had been quoted, to the effect that he had two petitions; one that he should be allowed the house at Croydon, and some small grounds pertaining to the same of no great value, and that he should not be held liable to his successor for dilapidations. [An Hon. MEMBER: That is very like a bargain.] Very like a bargain! why Archbishop Grindal neither made nor attempted to make a bargain. He resigned unconditionally, and there was not a syllable in the engagement to resign that would serve the argument of his hon. and learned Friend. His hon. and learned Friend said this was not a corrupt transaction, because it was a transaction in facie ecclesiæ. Were they really to take it for granted that the law was, as laid down by the Solicitor General of Her Majesty's Government, that a transaction with regard to resignation of benefice, if done publicly, removed all taint of simony, and made it a prudent, safe, and pure transaction? He could hardly suppose that his hon. and learned Friend intended the Committee to take that for law, but, if he did, he (Mr. Gladstone) must really request him to give his authority, and show them where it was so laid down in the Ecclesiastical Law. Where was his authority for defining simony as a resignation secretly made for money; but that, if the resignation were made for money publicly and under the sanction of the constituted authority, the bargain so made was not simony? Would the hon. and learned Gentleman produce his authority for that proposition? If not, his mere dictum could not be accepted. It was certainly in total contradiction to all that he (Mr. Gladstone) had ever heard or read. What a happy invention it was on the part of the Solicitor General! His (Mr. Gladstone's) right hon. Friend (Mr. Walpole) did not consider publicity a cure for simony. Where, then, was the authority of the Solicitor General for his definition? Where was his authority to show that at any period in the history of the Church it had been permitted to make a bargain to resign a spiritual cure for money, and that that transaction was to be considered a lawful and legitimate one because it was carried on publicly? He entirely dissented from such an opinion, and held his judgment in a state of suspense with respect to the law which his hon. and learned Friend had laid down.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, it was much to be regretted that his right hon. Friend had not been brought up to the bar, so great was the legal talent he had displayed, so great were his powers of special pleading. Observe the art with which he had shifted his ground. He had denounced the Bill, but now with a dexterity that would have done honour to a pleader, he changed the question into an inquiry into a Bishop's letter. He (the Solicitor General) had read to the House the case of the Bishop of Durham, and the right hon. Gentleman had endeavoured to pervert it to his own views. Unfortunately, however, in olden times a custom prevailed—and this only showed how dangerous was “a little learning”—that when a Bishop wished to retire he made application that provisores might be appointed to make provision for him, and his resignation was always conditional upon that being done. When this Bishop of Durham desired to resign he made application for a residence to be assigned to him, and his resignation was always conditional. [Mr. GLADSTONE: Where does he stipulate? Where are the words?] “Et datis ad hoc provisoribus.” What was the case with regard to Archbishop Grindal? He threw himself upon the consideration of the Queen, but he stipulated for his house at Croydon, for freedom from liability on account of dilapidations, and for a provision for his domestics. These three things were granted before he resigned. With regard to what the right hon. Gentleman had imputed to him on the subject of simony, he denied having said that an act would be less simoniacal because it was done in facie ecclesiæ. What he said was that it was evidence there was no corruption when it was done in facie ecclesiæ. He had also said that by the statute of Henry VIII. the metropolitan might have legally made these arrangements without the necessity of an Act of Parliament, but that the peculiar circumstances connected with the cases of London and Durham he considered required an Act of Parliament.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he was very sorry that this conflict had arisen, but, as it had, they had better fight it out. They stood there upon a footing of equality. His hon. and learned Friend complained of his (Mr. Gladstone's) art as a pleader; but surely that was not a particular in which the hon. and learned Gentleman was taken at a disadvantage. He hinted at what he (Mr. Gladstone) might have done at the bar, but the unhappy fact remained that he had never been there, and on that score the hon. and learned Solicitor General had surely no right to complain. His hon. and learned Friend had made a quotation respecting the resignation of Archbishop Grindal, but that quotation was in the third person, and they were the words of the historian and not of the Archbishop himself. In Archbishop Grindal's own document he gave his promise to resign absolutely and without the slightest reference to any condition. At a subsequent period, but before the resignation took place, the Archbishop asked for the house and manor of Croydon, but he never attempted to qualify his promise of resignation. The promise of his resignation was one thing; the asking for a residence was another thing. Now, in the Bill before the Committee, these two things were connected by an indissoluble link, but in the case of Archbishop Grindal they were separate and entirely distinct. That was the case he wished to establish. The Committee could not fail to mark the contrast between the confidence with which his hon. and learned Friend commenced this discussion—producing this volume in their faces, and saying that any man who had considered the Ecclesiastical Law for a single hour might see the whole thing, and then ending in a tone of triumph with his sic repulsi sunt accusatores cum probris—and the subdued tone with which he had made his second quotation. The hon. and learned Gentleman then hung over his book in a manner much more gingerly, and did not indulge himself in that facility and promptitude of citation which had marked his first address. He made such a jejune and faint reference to the document as a man would do who only had “a little knowledge” of his subject, or who was venturing to speak upon it without having given so much as an hour to the study of ecclesiastical history. But let the Committee simply read the document, and then would they see who was right:—

That was the first portion of the document. Now, his assertion was, that the recital of the resignation was a thing apart from the question of the provision made for the Bishop, precisely as, he contended, ought to be the case with regard to the provision for the Bishops of London and Durham. The document then went on to say—

“Et datis ad hoc provisoribus, Archiepiscopo Eboracensi et Londinensi et Wigornienſi Episcopis, assignata sunt ei tria maneria, — viz., de Hoveden cum pertinentiis, Stoctuna et Esingtona.”

This constituted the whole case between him and his hon. and learned Friend, and, without troubling the Committee further, he would leave them to decide who had taken the more correct view of the subject.

MR. NAPIER said, that if “a little learning” was dangerous there was sometimes even more danger in great learning. He (Mr. Napier) contended that there could be no lawful resignation without a condition annexed, and he would test that in this way. Would the hon. and learned Gentleman be content to let the Bishop of London send his resignation to the Archbishop, and let the Archbishop assign him a third of his income? He was surprised to hear the hon. and learned Solicitor General attempt to confuse the Committee by his mystifications upon a very simple question, and he challenged the hon. and learned Gentleman to state before the Committee that there had been an unconditional resignation.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, that to say a man could not bargain to resign upon such terms as the law allowed him to do was an idea consistent neither with law nor with common sense. He repeated there had been no corrupt bargain; and the resignations had not taken place under the statute of Henry VIII., for reasons he had already stated.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to; as was also Clause 2.

Clause 3 (Pensions to be payable to the said Bishops).

MR. T. DUNCOMBE said, he should propose, as an Amendment on the clause, to omit the words conferring the pensions.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 14, to leave out from the words “There shall be,” to the word “life,” in line 17.

COLONEL NORTH said, he would take that opportunity of protesting against the speech of the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Hadfield). The noble Viscount at the head of the Government might just as well be reproached for the thousands of pounds he had received from the public during his long and splendid career. When the hon. Member talked about the receipts of the two right rev. Prelates he should remember their public services and their munificent charities.

MR. HADFIELD said, he could not understand the hon. and gallant Member's speech. The hon. and gallant Gentleman had not attempted to refute his (Mr. Hadfield's) figures; he had only told them that these two Bishops were charitable. Charitable! With whose money had they been charitable? There was one who would not take robbery for sacrifice; and for those two Gentlemen to take bread of ten thousand families fixed a stigma upon the country. He dared not express what he felt when they talked to him of the charities of men who luxuriated on such incomes, drawn from such sources, and paid them for such services.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he considered that these discussions were of a very painful character. The Bishops did not boast of their charity. If there had been any vaunting at all on the subject, it proceeded from men of all parties who had a warm and conscientious admiration of the liberality of those right rev. Prelates. It was most desirable that the Committee should decide on the Amendment. He did not know whether it was the intention of the hon. Member for Finsbury to name a smaller pension, but he (Mr. Gladstone) accepted the Amendment as an objection to granting any pension as a condition of resignation. There was a difference between the case of the Bishop of Durham and that of the Bishop of London. The former succeeded to his diocese under a regulated income of £8,000 a year, and it was from a defect of the law that he had received a larger sum. The Bishop of London, on the other hand, entered upon his see quite free from any stipulations or Parliamentary enactments. In estimating the pension of the Bishop of Durham, Parliament ought, therefore, to regard the annual salary of £8,000, and not make a calculation on the basis of emoluments which accidentally resulted from the faulty provisions of the Act of 1836.

MR. HEADLAM said, he could willingly bear testimony to the liberality of the Bishop of Durham's charitable donations in his diocese.

MR. CARDWELL said, he should vote against the Amendment, not wishing to withhold all pension from these Prelates. He concurred in thinking that the allowance to the Bishop of Durham should be regulated by the salary that he ought to have received, not by the amount which he had received owing to the unfortunate circumstance of the Act of Parliament being nugatory.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE said, he was opposed to either of these Prelates having pensions upon the conditions expressed in their correspondence with the Prime Minister.

MR. WIGRAM said, he held that, irrespective of any contract between the Bishops and the Minister of the day, a Prelate who had served his country so long was entitled to an allowance of not less than one-third of the existing salary on his retirement from old age or infirmity.

Question put, "That the words 'paid to the said Bishop' stand part of the clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 105; Noes 30: Majority 75.

MR. ROEBUCK said, he would now move to omit the words "six thousand," from page 2, line 15, and insert instead the words "three thousand five hundred," as the amount of the retiring pension for the Bishop of London. He understood that by the new regulations the salary of this Bishop would be £10,000; and, therefore, one-third of that sum would form a fair retiring allowance.

* Question put, "That the words 'six thousand' stand part of the clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 104; Noes 19: Majority 85.

House resumed.

Committee report progress; to sit again this day.

THE AFFAIRS OF SPAIN—QUESTION.

MR. MURROUGH said, he would beg to inquire of the First Lord of the Treasury, whether the Government were prepared to adopt any and what means for the prevention of the armed interference of France in the internal affairs of Spain?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, I apprehend that there is at present nothing in regard to the affairs of Spain which could lead to any interference on the part of the French Government with those affairs. The Emperor of the French is a man of great justice, and would, I think in any case, feel that foreign interference with the affairs of the Spanish nation, except under circumstances which we cannot foresee, would be unjust. He is also a man of great sagacity, and the lessons of the past teach that those Sovereigns of France who have been led to interfere in the affairs of Spain have always, sooner or later, found that interference more or less disastrous to themselves. There can be no reason for apprehending that there is on the part of the French Government any intention to interfere in Spain.

ROMAN CATHOLIC CLERGY IN INDIA—QUESTION.

MR. GROGAN said, he would beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Control, whether any minute had been made by the Government

General of India, recognising delegates from the see of Rome, under the style and title of Vicars Apostolic, as the official channels of communication with the Government in matters connected with the Roman Catholic Church, and admitting the propriety of addressing the aforesaid Vicars Apostolic in official communications according to the ecclesiastical rank and position bestowed upon them by the Pope? Whether the Roman Catholic Bishops at each seat of Government were to be allowed a certain salary to enable them to send Returns, and to correspond with the Government? Whether a Roman Catholic priest, with a fixed salary, was to be allowed at every station where there might be British-born Roman Catholics, although there should be no European regiment stationed there? Whether the Roman Catholic priests were to be allowed to receive medical attendance and medicines gratuitously in certain cases? Whether grants were to be given in aid of building Roman Catholic Chapels? And whether, although the Government orphanages were open to Roman Catholic children as to all others, a sum equal to the cost of maintaining each child is to be paid to Roman Catholic orphanages into which such child shall be received?

MR. VERNON SMITH said, the hon. Member appeared to have based his question rather upon applications which might have been made to the Governor General of India than upon any instructions which were issued by him. There was no Minute of which he (Mr. V. Smith) was aware similar to that to which the first question of the hon. Member related. Instructions had been sent out to India by the Government to the effect that there should be no alteration in the status of the Roman Catholic Bishops, and by orders which had been previously sent out they were not entitled to any consideration arising out of the rank which they happened to hold in the Roman Catholic Church. For a long period the Roman Catholic prelates had been allowed a pecuniary stipend for sending returns relating to their co-religionists, which was the best mode the Government possessed of obtaining information on such subjects. Latterly that remuneration had been confined to four Roman Catholic Bishops, of whom there was one in each of the four Presidencies of India. Roman Catholic priests at military posts, where European regiments were stationed, had always been allowed a fixed salary, and a similar privilege had lately been extended to stations where there were British-born Roman Catholic subjects employed in the civil service, the rule in India being that in those cases in which men were engaged in that service their religious education should be provided for. They had also been allowed to receive medicines and medical attendance gratuitously, owing to the difficulty of procuring those necessities at remote stations. With respect to the last question, he should state that he was not aware that a sum equal to the cost of maintaining each child was to be paid to Roman Catholic orphanages in particular. Instructions had, however, been sent out to the effect that every attention should be paid to the teaching of Roman Catholic children in the several districts.

MR. GROGAN said, he desired more particular information as to the dignity and position of the Roman Catholic Bishops.

MR. VERNON SMITH said, that the only information he could give the hon. Member was, that those prelates were not entitled to any consideration in consequence of their rank and condition in the Roman Catholic Church.

THE MISSION TO BELGIUM—QUESTION.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he had seen it stated in the London Gazette that the Earl of Westmorland had been sent by Her Majesty on a mission of congratulation to the King of the Belgians. He begged to inquire at whose expense that mission had been undertaken?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I am afraid that my hon. Friend will have to contribute his share.

EXPULSION OF JAMES SADLEIR.

MR. ROEBUCK said that, according to the rules of the House, he was entitled to precedence in the Motion he was now about to submit, which was one for the expulsion of a Member. He was about to ask the House to exercise a power inherent in it, and which was of the greatest importance as regarded the maintenance of its honour, its efficiency, and its influence in the country. He would not call upon hon. Members to use that power on light grounds, nor upon an occasion when it could be said that their act would tend to the establishing of a precedent dangerous to that House. He would not ask them to pass judgment by way of punishment on a man whom he supposed to be guilty, but to free themselves from the companionship of a man who had disgraced himself in the eyes of the nation. He would not ask them to constitute themselves, and assume the functions of a Court of adjudication, for those functions, properly speaking, they did not exercise. All he desired was, that hon. Members should satisfy their own consciences as to the truth of the statements which he was about to lay before them: and if, as was the general rule, they would take the observations of one hon. Member as to facts of which he himself was cognisant to be correct, he felt no doubt that they would accede to the Motion which he had risen to propose. That Motion was, that Mr. James Sadleir, Member for the county of Tipperary, be expelled this House. The grounds on which he made the proposition were briefly these:—He did not say that Mr. Sadleir was guilty of the charges brought against him; with that he (Mr. Roebuck) had nothing to do. All he had to say was, that charges had been brought against him derogatory of his honour and destructive of his power and capacity as a Member of that House—charges which, not being rebutted by him, were a disgrace to that House as long as the person to whom they related continued a Member of it. Such were the accusations that had been brought against Mr. Sadleir. Into their truth he would not inquire, but what he did charge against him was, that, knowing that these accusations had been made against him, he fled from justice and did not attempt to defend himself. The charge which he (Mr. Roebuck) made was, not that he was guilty of a crime, but that, having fled from the accusation of one, he had confessed himself guilty of it. All that he had to make out was, that Mr. Sadleir had fled from the charge. The proof of that fact, he considered, would suffice to justify his expulsion. The first thing to be done was to show that he had been charged with a crime. On that point the papers that had been laid upon the table furnished abundant evidence. The bill of indictment found at Clonmel Assizes by the grand jury of the county of Tipperary—a document of which he held in his hand a certified abstract—attested that, upon the 18th of July, the grand jury returned against him a true bill, charging him on eight counts with fraud. That, be it observed, was on the 18th of July. On the 20th of June, the Master of the Rolls in Ireland used these words in delivering a judgment:—"It is now necessary to go to the succeeding stage of these proceedings, which I believe is unparalleled in the annals of fraud." So that, as early as the 19th of June, Mr. Sadleir must have known that he was charged with fraud. Last Friday, he (Mr. Roebuck) gave notice that he should call upon the honourable Member for Tipperary—no, his tongue had made a lapse—he would not call him the honourable Member, but the Member for Tipperary, to be present in his place while he (Mr. Roebuck) made a Motion for his expulsion. It appeared, therefore, that the Member had had notice, first, that in a judgment delivered by the Master of the Rolls, as far back as the 20th of June, he was charged with fraud; and, secondly, that on the 18th of July a Bill of indictment for that offence was found against him in the town of Clonmel by the grand jury of the county of Tipperary. Nor was that all. Some time previously a warrant for his apprehension had been issued by the Government, and the House had sent their messenger in search of him both to Dublin and to Tipperary. He was not to be found. He was not in the House, nor had they been able to discover him elsewhere. The inference was, that he had fled from justice, and, having done so, he asserted that he was not worthy to sit as a Member of that House. It might be said that he (Mr. Roebuck) was about to commit the House to a perilous precedent; and this case had been put to him, "Suppose that you had gone to America, and that some Member were to get up in his place and to give notice that next Thursday he should move that Mr. Roebuck do appear in his place on a subsequent day, when a motion for his expulsion would be submitted, what would you say to such a proceeding?" His answer was, that if he had been charged with fraud by the Master of the Rolls, if a bill of indictment had been found against him, if a warrant had been issued against him, and if that House had sent out their messenger to find him, and if, notwithstanding all these proceedings he had failed to appear in his place, he should deserve to be expelled. But it might be asked, "Why act with haste in such a matter? Where would be the danger in waiting till next Session?" Waiting till next Session! Had they not waited long enough already? Was this a case for delay? To protract it further was as though a man should lie down by the side of a dead body and attempt to compose himself with the noisomeness thereof. This man had disgraced the House, had brought shame and ignominy on the House, and the House, if it regarded its own honour, had nothing for it but to cut off the peccant Member. His expulsion, hon. Members must be aware, would not render him incapable of being again elected. The case of John Wilkes had established that fact. Though they should expel him that evening, it would be competent for him to go down to Tipperary to-morrow and solicit the suffrages of the constituents. But would he do so? He (Mr. Roebuck) would appeal to any Member of that House to say whether he did not in his heart believe that Sadleir had evaded the law, and that, in expelling him, the House would only be doing justice both to him and to themselves? Precedents were not to be disregarded on a question of this kind, and, if required, they could be cited. It might, no doubt, be argued that there had been in the case of the Member for Tipperary no conviction; but it was by no means necessary for his (Mr. Roebuck's) case to prove that there had been, inasmuch as the other grounds upon which he had based his Motion were, in his opinion, amply sufficient to recommend it to the adoption of the House. One of those grounds was that James Sadleir had evaded public justice; and a man could be supposed to take that course only for one of two reasons—either because he imagined he would not have a fair trial, or because he was conscious of guilt. The former reason could not, as hon. Members well knew, have any force in the case of the Member for Tipperary; therefore, the only conclusion at which they could legitimately arrive was, that he knew himself to be guilty and had sought safety in flight. But to advert to precedents, he (Mr. Roebuck) might observe that there was one to be found in 5 Geo. II., in the year 1732. In that case George Robinson had had the following charges made against him, and the following Resolution passed in his regard:—

“George Robinson, Esq., having been charged in Parliament with being privy to, and concerned in, many indirect and fraudulent practices in the management of the affairs of the Charitable Corporation for the Relief of Industrious Poor, and having never attended the service of this House, although required so to do, is guilty of a high contempt of the orders and authority of this House; resolved, that for his said offence he be expelled this House.”

Now, was not that a case exactly parallel with the one before the House? Mr. James Sadleir had been charged with fraud; he had been summoned, but he did not comply, and failed to appear in his place in that House. The Master of the Rolls, as far back as the 19th of June, gave him clearly to understand what was hanging over his head; the grand jury at Clonmel found a true bill against him; warrants had been issued against him by the Crown, but he had not been found. What greater proof, therefore, could they have that he had evaded justice? Another case that might be cited was that of Mr. Benjamin Walsh, who had been tried and convicted of fraud; but the conviction had subsequently been quashed, yet, notwithstanding that circumstance, the House proceeded to expel Mr. Walsh. On that occasion, Sir Francis Burdett observed:—

“He was very far from being a stickler for what were called the privileges of Parliament, but certainly, if there was a privilege or a power in any body or assembly less disputable than another, he conceived it to be that of declaring any one of the individuals of which they were composed unfit and unworthy of associating amongst them. It was, at all events, a power which, when compared with the other extraordinary privileges assumed by Parliament, appeared to him to be of all others the least liable to abuse, because if any member was expelled from any motives of party zeal or personal persecution, a remedy would be open to him in an appeal to his constituents, who, if they thought differently of his conduct, could unquestionably restore him to his seat.”—[1 Hansard, xxi. 1187.]

Mr. Wynn, a great authority on Parliamentary matters, also said that—

“The object of the present Motion was not to punish Mr. Walsh, but to take a very important trust out of the hands of a person entirely unworthy to hold it.”—[Ibid. 1194.]

Mr. Perceval remarked, as to the previous case of the Member charged with misappropriating the funds of a charitable corporation, that there had been no legal conviction, yet the House was not content with simple expulsion—it also asked for a legal prosecution. Thus it appeared that the House, after expelling a Member, went further, and addressed the Crown to institute a prosecution against him. It did not wait for a conviction before it acted; and even after the acquittal of Mr. Benjamin Walsh, it thought itself justified in expelling a man who had been legally pronounced innocent. It said it was morally convinced of his guilt, although by the laws of his country he had been allowed to escape; and that not as a court of justice, but as a body of persons called upon to satisfy their own consciences, they were persuaded the individual in question was unworthy to hold the important trust confided to a Member of that House. Such being his opinions, and feeling that every hour the representative for Tipperary remained a Member of that House, the power, the consideration, and the honour of that assembly were tainted and impaired, he should beg to move the expulsion of Mr. James Sadleir on the grounds set forth in the statement which he had just made.

MR. NAPIER said, he rose to second the Motion of the hon. and learned Gentleman, which raised a most important constitutional question. The jurisdiction which the House was invited to exercise concerned not only its own character and honour, but also the interests of the constituency of Tipperary, now left substantially without a representative. A notion very generally, and perhaps very naturally, prevailed, that the House at that moment had not materials technically sufficient to act upon. That impression doubtless arose from confounding the jurisdiction of that House with the ordinary jurisdiction of the courts of law. They could not examine witnesses on oath, they did not proceed on technical grounds, but rather on what satisfied the conscience of the House. That assembly being the exclusive judge of the worthiness of its own Members had now to determine whether, having regard to facts well known to them all, and on which they could fairly act, it was not due to the honour and dignity of Parliament that James Sadleir should no longer be suffered to retain his seat? In matters of that kind they must be governed by established usage and precedent. A Committee of that House sat in 1807 to examine into all the precedents of the expulsion of Members; and in the Report of that Committee all the precedents down to that date were set forth and classified. It was remarkable that by far the greater number of them were cases in which there had been no legal conviction. It should be observed in limini, that in one or two singular instances of this description the House proceeded first to expel the person whom it regarded as an unworthy Member, and then addressed the Crown to direct the Attorney General to prosecute him—thus marking the distinction which it drew between the case of Members whom it deemed not entitled to the appellation “honourable,” and that of those who might or might not be legally convicted of crime. A man indicted for a heinous offence might elude punishment on some purely technical point, and yet in substance and in fact be really unfit to remain a Member of that House. There was a class of offences—such for example as the frauds in regard to which the Attorney General for England had brought in a Bill in the course of the Session, and the Attorney General for Ireland had promised to bring in one next Session,—which were undoubtedly grave crimes in foro conscientie, although not indictable by the law of the land. It therefore became the duty of the House, without setting themselves up as affected purists, honestly to inquire whether one of their own Members was not proved, by notorious facts to which they could not shut their eyes, to have evinced a degree of moral turpitude which disqualified him from remaining enrolled in the list of that assembly. On such questions the House acted on the statement of one of its Members in his place. And why so? Because they were bound to repose confidence in the honour of each other, the principle being that hon. Members, though returned for particular constituencies, were all bound together, as, in a sense, representing the whole community. In the Report of the Committee to which he had referred, the precedents were chronically arranged, and the first one enumerated was very remarkable. It happened in 1558. Mr. John Smyth had defrauded several merchants in London, and the question was raised whether he was entitled to the privilege of Parliament in regard to legal process. In Hatsell, p. 81, it was stated:—

“It should seem from the words of the order that the doubt was . . . whether a man who appeared to the House to have been guilty of so gross a fraud ought any longer to continue a Member. And as Prynne says, ‘How honourable this vote was for the House in the case of such a cheating Member, carried only by five voices, is not fit for me to determine.’”

Again, the case of Sir John Leeds, in 1620, was that of a Member who, having been committed to the custody of the Serjeant-at-Arms, made his escape; and it was remarked, in the fourth volume of Hatsell, page 109, in a note, that “having by his flight acknowledged his guilt, he is expelled the House of Commons.” Passing over many intermediate precedents, and coming to the period subsequent to the Revolution of 1688, there was the case of 1710, in which the House resolved, nem. con.:—

“That it appears in this House that Thomas Ridge, Esq., a Member of this House, is guilty of great fraud and abuses, by having contracted to furnish 5,513 ton of beer upon his own account, and 2,704 ton of beer in partnership with Mr. Dixon, and having received bills for the whole; although he delivered but 3,213 ton on the first, and but 1,269 upon the latter contract; that the said Thomas Ridge, Esq., be, for the said frauds and abuses, expelled this House; that an humble address be presented to Her Majesty, that she will please to give direction to Her Attorney General to prosecute the said Mr. Ridge for the said frauds and abuses.”

He would not refer to the South Sea cases, because their circumstances were peculiar. The ground upon which Mr. Robinson—to whose case the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck) had referred—was expelled, was thus declared in the Resolution of the House of Commons:—

“Resolved, that George Robinson, Esq., having been charged in Parliament with being privy to and concerned in many indirect and fraudulent practices, * * * and having never attended the service of this House, although required so to do, is guilty of a high contempt of the orders and authority of this House.”

The expulsion was not based upon the charge of fraud, but simply on the ground that Mr. Robinson having been ordered to attend in his place, and having failed to do so, he had been guilty of contempt of the House. He found, from the Journals, that in the following year an Address to the Crown was agreed upon, praying that the Attorney General might be directed to prosecute the expelled Member. The next case to which his (Mr. Napier's) attention had been directed was that of Mr. Atkinson, who was indicted for perjury; a verdict was found against him, but he was never called up for judgment. The Attorney General for that day stated the whole process against Mr. Atkinson, the issue of which, he said, was,—

“That Mr. Atkinson had absconded from the justice of his country. In this situation it became Parliament to attend to their own dignity and importance. The Member had been indicted, in his opinion, on the clearest and most unexceptionable evidence, for what the laws of this and every other country held a very grievous offence; and the question would naturally be with Gentlemen, how was the House to act in such a case? Every society, in his opinion, were competent to their own preservation. It was the duty of Parliament, as he conceived, for that reason, to come to an immediate decision on a point, in which its honour and respectability were so essentially interested.”

In the present case, indictments had been found against James Sadleir; he had absconded from justice; the Attorney General for Ireland and the Government had done everything in their power to cause his apprehension; a warrant had been issued against him, and a reward had been offered for his capture. An order of that House had been made, requiring the attendance of Mr. Sadleir: and, as he had neither appeared to answer the indictments nor obeyed the order of the House, he (Mr. Napier) considered that the precedents he had quoted fully justified his expulsion. In the case of Lord Cochrane, Lord Castlereagh said:—

“Indeed, it never had been held that expulsion could rest upon any other grounds than that the Member expelled had not delivered himself from the charge legally charged upon him, and that therefore he was not a fit person to remain in this House.”

He (Mr. Napier) thought that opinion of Lord Castlereagh, and the opinion of the Attorney-General in the case of Atkinson, fully justified the House in adopting the Motion of the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield. When a Judge had declared in public Court that James Sadleir had been guilty of gigantic frauds; when it had been stated in a judicial judgment that those frauds had resulted from a conspiracy; when the charge had been embodied in informations; when warrants had been issued; when indictments had been found by the grand jury, which James Sadleir did not appear to answer; and when, having been ordered to attend in his place in that House he had neglected to do so, he (Mr. Napier) would ask whether it was right and fitting that the constituency of Tipperary should be left with such a person as their representative, and whether he should still be the companion of Members of that House, and entitled to claim the title of “honourable”? The Attorney General for Ireland had stated that the case was one of such a special character that the opinion of high legal authorities in Ireland, that James Sadleir should not be prosecuted by the Crown, had been overruled, and the Attorney General had himself undertaken the prosecution. The case of Mr. Walsh was one of a very remarkable character. He was charged with felony; but the opinion of the Judge was that the offence did not amount to felony. On the Motion for his expulsion there were in the minority of eighteen the names of some of the most honoured that outlawry, although the law did not consider a judgment of outlawry tantamount to an admission of guilt, yet if that step was arrived at, the House would have something on which it might act, and, if it thought fit, expel Mr. Sadleir. He would now allude to another matter. It would be recollected that on Monday last the House made an order that Mr. Sadleir should attend in his place on that day. As yet the House had not before it what took place upon that order, but he might state that on Monday evening one of the messengers of the House proceeded to Ireland, and on the following day (Tuesday), he served the order at the residence of Mr. Sadleir, in the county of Tipperary. Also, on the same day, he served the order at a place pointed out to him in Dublin where Mr. Sadleir had once resided, and likewise upon parties who were represented to him to be the solicitors who acted for Mr. Sadleir, in the Tipperary Bank case. It thus appeared that due diligence had been used; but they could not shut their eyes to the fact that it was only on Monday last that the Order of the House was made, and that it was not until the following day that it was served at the residence of Mr. Sadleir, in Tipperary. He made this preliminary statement to enable the House to form its judgment. Speaking of the case generally, he did not say that it was his intention, or the intention of the Government, to resist the Motion of the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck). The case was peculiarly one for the House itself to determine. It involved the honour and character of the House, and the House ought to deal with it in its judicial capacity. But it behoved them, the proceeding being judicial in its nature, to act with great care and with prudent examination beforehand. The hon. and learned Member for Sheffield said he did not call upon the House to come to the conclusion that the charges were true and the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Napier) asked the House to proceed, not on evidence but on conscience; but he would say that in a judicial proceeding they should proceed with great care, and in his judgment if they made an Order in accordance with the Motion they would take a very dangerous step. He did not say that the Motion ought to be resisted. It was a proper Motion, but the decision of the House upon it, he considered, ought to be deferred, inasmuch as the time had not yet arrived when they could act upon anything before them. He could not forget that the House had already by statute, with respect to seats affected by election petitions, denuded itself to a great extent of the power which it once exercised and in some cases abused; had confined that power within narrow limits; and had decided that in its proceedings it ought to be guided by something like legal evidence. In the case of Mr. Sadleir, his opinion was that, having regard to the constitution, the House ought not to pronounce a judgment without a proper preliminary inquiry—without either a confession of guilt or an amount of legal evidence tantamount to it. Nothing had yet occurred to justify the House in coming to the conclusion that there had been an admission of guilt. There was not to be found one solitary case in which the House, unless in times of violence, when might and not law regulated its proceedings, had expelled a Member without either a conviction, a confession of something which rendered him unfit to continue in his seat, or some inquiry at the bar or by a Select Committee. All the precedents which had been referred to classed themselves under one or other of those categories. In the first—that of Mr. Robinson, in 1732—a Select Committee was appointed to inquire into the alleged frauds. Mr. Robinson, however, was not expelled for fraud, but for contempt, he having obstinately refused, after due notice had been served upon him, to appear and answer the charge before the House. The case of Mr. Benjamin Walsh in 1812, was one of conviction for felony, but the charge of felony contained within it an accusation of gross fraud, whatever might be the legal definition of the crime. Walsh, in fact, could not have been convicted unless the jury had found the truth of this charge of fraud. After his trial and conviction the Judge came to the conclusion that, though the charge was true, yet in its legal definition it was not felony. Such was the state of the case when the House undertook to deal with it. The charge of fraud was found to have been established beyond the shadow of a doubt, and, although that fraud did not amount in a legal sense to felony, the House very properly expelled the Member. In almost all the cases which had been referred to the Member was either personally present or had made an admission of his guilt. He did not put these cases forward to prove that the House could deal only with cases of crime. If a Member had been guilty of that which tainted his moral character—which, though not a legal crime, made him unfit to continue in his seat—the House might and ought to expel him. Nor did he wish to say that, in order to warrant the expulsion of Mr. Sadleir, the House must come to the conclusion that crime had been committed. The House need not even enter into that question, but if it found that he had been guilty of fraud of such a character that he ought not to be allowed to consort with the Members of the House, it would then be its duty to expel him. None of the cases which had been referred to, including those mainly relied upon by the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield, were at all similar to that of Mr. Sadleir. In the case of Mr. Wilkes, which bore no analogy to the present, a speech was delivered by Mr. Grenville, which pointed out very clearly what course the House ought to pursue. Mr. Grenville said—

“Whenever this House has expelled any Member it has invariably assigned some particular offence as the reason for such expulsion. By the fundamental principles of this constitution the right of judging upon the general propriety or unfitness of their representatives is intrusted with the electors; and, when chosen, this House can only exclude or expel them for some disability established by the law of the land, or for some specific offence alleged and proved.

We are now acting in our judicial capacity, and are therefore bound to found the judgment which we are to give, not upon our wishes and inclinations, not on our private belief or arbitrary opinions, but on specific facts alleged and proved according to the established rules and course of our proceedings.”—[Hansard, Parl. History, xvi. 561.]

In that advice so given by Mr. Grenville, the House would find the soundest principles to guide its proceedings, and a course of action laid down, which he hoped would never be departed from. The only precedent which he could find that had a distinct bearing upon the matter before the House was the case of Mr. Hunt, in 1810. Mr. Hunt held the situation of Treasurer of the Ordnance, and, upon the Report of a Commission, was charged with being a defaulter, and with having misappropriated public funds to the extent of £83,000. The Report of that Commission had been on the table some time when Mr. Calcraft gave notice that he would, upon the 4th of April, 1810, bring the case before the House; but on an intimation from the Speaker that his notice had been too short, he withdrew it, and gave notice again for the 17th of April.

Upon that day, again at the suggestion of the Speaker, he deferred his Motion, and it finally came on for discussion on the 23rd of May. It appeared then that Mr. Hunt had gone to Lisbon, and that an Order of the House had been served upon him. Mr. Calcraft also produced a letter, which was proved to be in Mr. Hunt's handwriting, in which he admitted to have received the Order of the House, and also admitted his guilt, although not to the extent charged against him. The House then came to a Resolution that Mr. Hunt had been guilty of embezzlement, and to the further Resolution that he should be expelled the House. From the course which the present case had taken it was quite unnecessary that he should go through the whole of the precedents, and he would only state that he had examined them with care, and that they all partook of the character which he had pointed out. He had also gone through the records of the Irish Parliament for the last century, and he found that the same rule had prevailed there—that they had expelled Members who had been guilty of crime and of fraudulent misconduct; but that in no case had they done so, except on conviction, confession, or inquiry. In 1703, a Mr. Asgill was expelled. The Resolution stated that the House had examined several witnesses, and found that Mr. Asgill was the author of a certain book, and therefore ordered him to be expelled. He would now see whether there was anything in the present case on which the House could safely proceed. It was said that the charge was made by the Master of the Rolls on the 4th of March, but James Sadleir was no party to the proceedings in that Court, and it was not until the 4th of July that anything took place on which they could act. If he might advise the House, he would say let the Motion stand over until they met again; in the meantime the proceedings would go on, Mr. James Sadleir would either be made amenable and tried, or judgment of outlawry would be recorded against him. In either case then the House would have something on which to proceed. He would only advert to one remark of the right hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin, who told the House they should proceed on conscience. From that it would appear that the right hon. and learned Gentleman was inclined to view this as a political question. He (Mr. J. D. Fitzgerald) hoped there was no Gentleman in the House who, on a question where the honour and character of the House were involved, would, under the name of conscience, deal with it in a political spirit. Against such a course he, at least, would enter his solemn protest.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD said, he quite agreed that this was a matter with which the House could not act with too much caution, but he did not think that the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland had stated to the House what the real facts of the case were. The facts were these:—Mr. James Sadleir's connection with the Tipperary Joint-stock Bank had been the subject of inquiry in the highest Court in Ireland, and the Judge of that Court had found that a letter had been written by the late Mr. John Sadleir to his brother James, pointing out by what means one of the most unparalleled frauds could be carried out. They had it before them that that letter had been found in the possession of Mr. James Sadleir, and also that the directions contained in the letter had been fully carried out by them. [MR. J. D. FITZGERALD: No, no!] Well, at all events, they had the fact that, in obedience to the directions contained in that letter, Mr. James Sadleir put his name to a fraudulent statement in respect to the position of the bank, and also that a fraud of so gigantic a nature had been perpetrated that the whole of the English shareholders, who in consequence of that fraudulent statement had invested money in the bank, were released from their liabilities. Those were the real facts which had been laid on the table of the House in the documents which were produced; and he must say, he was strongly of opinion that they ought, in consequence, to take some steps to secure the honour and reputation of the House. It must be recollected it would be impossible that any trial could take place before the Lent assizes, and therefore until the month of March next, Mr. James Sadleir would occupy the honourable position of a Member of Parliament. There was one thing he wished to know, which was, whether any proceedings of outlawry could be taken before that time? Although it was very true that until a trial and conviction had taken place, the House could not be put into formal possession of the facts of the case, yet he thought that no reasonable man could doubt—after what had been stated by a most upright Judge, who had fully investigated the facts of the case—that a great fraud had been committed by Mr. James Sadleir. His right hon. and learned Friend opposite (Mr. S. Wortley) had moved as an Amendment to the Motion made by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck) that the papers should be printed. The effect of that would be to get rid of the Motion altogether. The papers were very short, and hon. Members had been placed in full possession of the facts of the case, therefore he thought there was no excuse for not coming to a decision upon the main question.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he was most anxious to echo the advice given by his right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland, that they ought to proceed with the utmost deliberation in this case. He believed that his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Sheffield was animated with no other desire than to uphold the dignity and the honour of that House. But it must be remembered that they were now exercising a judicial function—they must take care, therefore, that they did not act with precipitancy which might possibly lead to injustice. The House must thoroughly understand, that if they adopted the Motion of his hon. and learned Friend they would establish a precedent; for there certainly had never yet been a case in which the House had expelled an individual Member, since law and justice had prevailed, except upon previous conviction or some Parliamentary inquiry, where the accused had an opportunity of vindicating himself. As far as he (the Attorney General) understood, Mr. James Sadleir was not a party to the proceedings before the Master of the Rolls; neither had he had any opportunity of explaining or refuting the charges which had been brought against him. He (the Attorney General) did not pretend to assert that a conviction was necessary to justify a proceeding of this nature; but, in his opinion, there ought to be some preliminary inquiry by the House into the facts of the case. It must be remembered that the judgment of the Master of the Rolls had been appealed from, and even if it had not, that judgment was not formally before the House. He could not understand why it was necessary that they should act hastily in the matter. It was quite clear that within a few days Parliament would be prorogued. The House, therefore, could not be offended by the presence of Mr. Sadleir, neither could his constituents receive any injury, because in the interval between the prorogation and the meeting of Parliament they would have no need of his services. In the meantime, Mr. Sadleir would be required to surrender and take his trial. Upon that trial he would be either convicted or acquitted. If he did not surrender, the proceeding of outlawry would take place, and it had been laid down by the highest Parliamentary authorities that outlawry upon a criminal proceeding would be sufficient to disqualify any man from sitting in Parliament. By a postponement, therefore, they would avoid the charge of precipitancy, and they would avoid creating a precedent which might hereafter be converted into a dangerous political instrument. Taking all the circumstances, therefore, of the case into consideration, he thought that the better course of proceeding would be to postpone the Motion until the commencement of the next Session.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he did not intend to enter into the merits of the case, but he would put it to his right hon. and learned Friend (Mr. S. Wortley) whether the better course would not be for him to withdraw his Motion for papers, and to let the House come at once to a decision on the Motion of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Sheffield. There was nothing in those papers that was not already known to the House, and they would not to-morrow be in any better position than they were in to-day for coming to a decision. As to the case itself, he entirely concurred with the opinions expressed by his right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland. They were now called upon to preserve the purity of the House; that was, no doubt, a most important application, but one of the chief elements of purity was a strict regard of the principles of justice, and an avoidance of precedents which might hereafter be converted to purposes of injustice. Assuming that there was a full conviction in the mind of every hon. Member of the guilt of James Sadleir, still he held that they ought not to take a proceeding in the nature of expulsion without being able to found it upon some formal indisputable ground, such as conviction or confession, or the Report, after due examination, of a Committee — something which, at present, they had not. He, therefore, urged the House, out of regard to its own purity and to the principles of justice, not to establish a precedent which might on future occasions be converted into an instrument of injustice, but to postpone their decision until they were in a better position to decide.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, there was one ground which compelled him to ask the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield not to press his Motion. A Motion was made on Monday for Mr. James Sadleir to appear in the House on Thursday. That period was very short, and Mr. Sadleir could scarcely have been present if he had felt so disposed.

MR. HENLEY said, he agreed with the noble Lord at the head of the Government, that the best way of vindicating the honour of the House was to act justly. Without expressing any opinion as to the case of James Sadleir, he thought that the worse the case seemed the more careful they ought to be not to act upon it until the person implicated had had an opportunity of being heard. He could not say that when notice to a person to appear in that House on a Thursday had only been given on a Monday, and there was no proofs of personal service, he was to be treated as absent.

MR. STUART WORTLEY said, he had no objection to withdraw his Amendment, if the hon. and learned Gentleman below him would withdraw his Motion. The hon. and learned Member for Sheffield makes no sign. Under these circumstances he could only withdraw his Amendment, on the understanding that the noble Lord would move the previous Question.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I beg, Sir, to move the previous Question.

MR. ROEBUCK: Sir, I suppose there will be no further discussion on this matter. It strikes me, from the statement of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland, that some political considerations are mixed up with this question—[cries of "No, no!"] I understood him so, and I think it a most unhappy thing that we cannot touch anything in regard to Ireland unless political feelings are imported into the discussion. I have done the best I could to support the honour and dignity of the House, and if I find the majority against me, of course I cannot help it. Hon. Gentlemen have talked about the danger of precedent. No man, however, had pointed out what that danger is. What is this case? A man commits a crime dishonourable in itself. He is found by the Master of the Rolls guilty of a fraud of the most atrocious description; and I ask, therefore, if such a man ought not to be expelled from the House of Commons? To talk about danger, and to affect a squeamishness of this sort, appears to me to be most inconsistent with the maintenance of the honour and dignity of the House. Sir, we stand dishonoured by the association with a peccant Member. I have done what I could to free you from that association, and the blame must therefore rest with those who have prevented me.

MR. NAPIER said, that in reference to the remark of his right hon. Friend (Mr. Henley) he could state that efforts had been made to serve the Order on James Sadleir, but he could not be found.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he must repudiate in the most distinct terms, on the part of the House, the charge which had been brought against it by the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield. The arguments that had been urged in the course of the discussion did honour both to those who had used them and to those who had been influenced by them. As far as he could understand the grounds upon which the House had proceeded, they had wholly discarded any considerations as to the side of the House upon which the person sat who was the object of the inquiry; they had proceeded entirely upon abstract principles of justice.

MR. MALINS said, he thought that the worst course to be adopted was, to move the previous question; but, at the same time, he wished it to be understood that his opinion was not grounded upon any hesitation of a private kind, as to whether this was a case in which it was necessary to expel a Member from the House or not. He hoped his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Roebuck) would renew his Motion. He did not think there could be any mode by which, except by accepting the Chiltern Hundreds, Mr. James Sadleir could now escape from the vote of that House, and the expulsion to which he ought to be subjected.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that having observed the course of the whole proceedings during the last six months, and not believing that any evidence could be adduced to justify the person in question, he was prepared to vote with the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield. But, as it appeared to be thought by a majority of the House that it was better to wait a little, he would recommend the hon. and learned Member not to divide, since if he were in a minority the effect would be that a great number would escape whom he believed to be equally guilty.

MR. STUART WORTLEY said he had no doubt the time would come when the House would interfere, but it would be better not to proceed hastily. When the time did come he did not question that the House would act with vigour and firmness.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Question again proposed, "That Mr. James Sadleir, having absconded from public justice, be expelled this House."

Whereupon the Previous Question, "That that Question be now put," was put, and negatived.

MR. ROEBUCK: I wish, Sir, to put a question to the noble Lord at the head of the Government. If an application is made for the Chiltern Hundreds for Mr. James Sadleir, will the Government pledge themselves not to grant it?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Undoubtedly.

BISHOPS OF LONDON AND DURHAM RETIREMENT BILL.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

Clause 3.

MR. ROEBUCK said, he should now move to omit the sum of £4,500, and to substitute the sum of £3,000 (the former being the amount proposed as the retiring pension of the Bishop of Durham). He took that course upon the following grounds—He was told upon the highest authority that the Bishop of Durham was entitled by law to a salary of £8,000 a year, but, that by an ingenious arrangement made between himself and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, he was to pay a certain sum of money, and receive all the proceeds of his estates after that amount. In that way, instead of £8,000 the Bishop had been in the receipt of some £14,000 or £16,000 a year. His proposition was to limit his retiring salary to one-third of that which it was originally intended he should have received.

Amendment proposed, in line 16, to leave out the words "four thousand five hundred" and insert the words "three thousand."

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he could not but think that the Motion of the hon. and learned Member had some claim upon the consideration of the Committee. No one could say that £3,000 was too small a sum for a Bishop who was wholly incapacitated for further business. He should support the Amendment, believing that the question stood upon different ground from the sum voted to the Bishop of London. In spite of what the Government said, the Bill would form a precedent for the income to be fixed hereafter in any general measure. There was nothing to justify so high a charge as this. The Bishop of Durham had had a larger income than £8,000, and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners had parted with property which did not belong to them when they gave him more than that sum.

MR. ROEBUCK said, that one reason which had been stated for giving the retiring Bishops those high salaries was, that they had establishments to maintain both in town and in the country; but it was idle to talk of voting away the money, and to suppose it was necessary for any such purpose; because, on their retiring, they would give up one at least of their establishments. By the present state of the law an active Bishop, in the full enjoyment of his faculties, got upon an average a sum of £5,000 a year, but in this instance they had already voted one Bishop who was retiring—because, according to his own statement, his infirmities had incapacitated him from performing his duties—a sum of £6,000 a year, which was actually more than they gave to a hardworking Bishop. That was an instance of the poverty of virtue. Our Bishops professed to be the successors of the Apostles; but certainly that was a curious mode of imitating their humility and poverty. He proposed that the retiring pension of one of these successors to the Apostles should be £3,000, and upon that he would divide the Committee.

MR. WILKINSON said, that the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck) had not put the case quite fairly when he stated that the Church must pay the Bishop of Durham £4,500 a year, or, if not, he would continue to enjoy an income of £16,000 per annum. By the arrangement proposed by the clause it was clear that there would be a gain to the common Ecclesiastical Fund.

MR. ROEBUCK said, that he did not say that the Committee was asked to vote £4,500 a year to a Bishop, but to one who had ceased to be a Bishop.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he could not allow the Committee to come to a vote upon the clause without informing it that the notion which had been suggested by the hon. and learned Gentleman, that the Bishop of Durham had hitherto received £8,000 per annum only, was not correct.

MR. ROEBUCK said, he must explain that he had stated that the arrangement made between the Ecclesiastical Commissioners and the Bishop was—the law being that he was to receive £8,000 a year—that upon his paying a certain round sum to the Commissioners he should receive the whole revenue, and in consequence of that arrangement his income had been from £14,000 to £16,000 per annum.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, that was just what he was coming to. Upon the ground of the Bishop's retiring, it was proposed to give him this salary; and it appeared to him (Lord Palmerston) that £4,500 was a sum not disproportionate to the actual receipts which had been taken by the Bishop of Durham, and which were admitted to be between £14,000 and £16,000. The result therefore was, that, after giving the Bishop this pension, and paying his successor £8,000, there would still be a surplus left at the disposal of the Ecclesiastical Commission.

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, he wished to call the attention of hon. Members to an argument which had been used, that unless the Committee yielded on his own terms the Bishop would retain his see. He (Lord R. Cecil) could not believe, after the confession of incapacity which had been made, that, whatever the vote of the Committee might be, the right rev. Prelate would retain his see in opposition to public opinion. He could not believe that they were in misericordiam as regarded those Bishops. The Bishop of Durham, by law, was entitled to £8,000 a year, but, by a particular arrangement, he had managed to obtain double that amount; and now he came to Parliament to ask for an allowance based upon that doubled income more than equal to the salary allowed to the working Bishops.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he was anxious to correct a mistake into which the noble Lord had fallen, and it would be important that he should state to the Committee what the law really was. If there were any arrangement, it was not framed by any ingenious contrivance between the Bishop of Durham and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, but its terms were imposed by an Act of Parliament, which provided that certain incomes should be assigned to certain Bishops, and, amongst the rest, that a salary of £8,000 should be assigned to the Bishop of Durham. Under that Act it was arranged that the salaries should be estimated upon the average receipts of the diocese, taken for a period of seven years before the acceptance of the see. Whenever those receipts should be in excess, the salary was to be a charge upon those revenues; on the other hand, if the revenues of the see fell short, the deficiency was to be made up by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. He considered that that was a very bad arrangement; and it had been admitted by the House to be so, for it had been repealed, and they passed a Bill, prescribing other terms which were better calculated to carry out the proposed object. The Bishop of Durham was, therefore, legally in possession of the income which he now received; and being in possession of that income, and spending it, as he (Sir G. Grey), living as he did in his diocese, could testify, most munificently; and having devoted large sums to the augmentation of small livings, he was now returning £2,000 a year to the Ecclesiastical Commission.

MR. CARDWELL said, that without imputing any contrivance to the Bishop, the fact remained the same. The Legislature had intended the income of the Bishop of Durham to be £8,000 per annum, while he had actually received about £16,000. In granting a retiring pension, if the amount was to be one-third of the income, the question arose in this case, was that proportion to be based upon the income which by error—of Parliament if they would, but certainly by some error—had been actually received by the Bishop, or upon the amount which it had been the intention of all parties he should receive? He was inclined to adopt the second rather than the first proposition. The noble Lord (Lord R. Cecil) had referred to some arguments, that if the terms proposed were not accepted there would be no resignation; but he (Mr. Cardwell) did not believe that if Parliament should vote a pension upon just and equitable terms, consistent with the spirit of precedent, any Prelate who had already admitted his incapacity to continue in his office would venture to refuse those terms.

MR. SPOONER said, he had supported the allowance of £6,000 to the Bishop of London upon the understanding that it was one-third part of his present income. He had been prepared to support the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield in the case of the Bishop of Durham, believing that the sum proposed by it was one-third part of the income to which that right rev. Prelate was legally entitled. He found now, however, that the Bishop was entitled legally to receive £16,000 per annum, and, therefore, he thought Parliament ought to deal with him as it had done with the Bishop of London, and calculate the retiring pension upon the amount he was legally entitled to receive.

MR. MOWBRAY said, he was of opinion that the retiring pension should be calculated upon the basis of the actual receipts of the Bishop, whose habits and expenses had been formed by the actual amount of his income. With respect to the Bishop of Durham, he could fully corroborate the statement of the right hon. Baronet (Sir G. Grey) of the munificence to which that income had been applied. The Bishop had been accustomed for many years past to contribute to all local charities within his diocese, nor did he confine his gifts to those institutions connected with the Church merely, but he extended them to such objects as the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield himself would take an interest in.

MR. DUNCAN hoped that the working clergy would be dealt with upon the same principles which were applied to Bishops.

Question put, "That the words 'four thousand five hundred' stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 52; Noes 19: Majority 33.

On the Question that Clause 3 should stand part of the Bill,

MR. MOWBRAY said, there was one point to which he wished to call the attention of the right hon. Baronet the Home Secretary. As, in consequence of the change which was about to be made, a number of poor clergymen would be deprived of the assistance which they now received from the Bishop of Durham, and as the "Common Fund" would benefit considerably by the new arrangement, he thought the case of such clergymen would be deserving of the special consideration of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners in their application of the "Common Fund." He regretted that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Walpole) was not present to hear this suggestion.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that the surplus would, of course, form part of the "Common Fund," but he was not aware whether the Ecclesiastical Commissioners had power specially to consider those peculiar cases. If they had such power he had no doubt they would do so; but he

MR. GLADSTONE said, the point which had just been raised gave a new aspect to the matter. The statement that £4,000 to £5,000 a year would be saved for the "Common Fund," no doubt induced many Members to support the proposed arrangement. It now appeared that a portion of that sum was to be impounded. The same question might be raised in reference to the diocese of London, seeing that the Bishop of London had, as every one knew, contributed enormously towards the support of the poorer clergy out of his episcopal income. It really appeared to him that the Bill had been introduced, if not under false pretences, at least under a sort of promise which could not be fulfilled. It would be impossible to keep up the charities of the present Bishops and to replenish the "Common Fund" at the same time.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that he had not stated that those claims should be considered, because he was not sure that the law would allow their consideration. He had only said that if the law gave them power to do so he had no doubt that the Ecclesiastical Commissioners would take into consideration the peculiar circumstances of small benefices which had for a considerable time been augmented. The raising of the question made him sincerely glad that an Amendment moved in another place, that all the surplus under the Bill should go to an episcopal fund, had been negatived.

MR. HEADLAM said, he thought that the claims of those clergymen stood so high that, if it was possible, they should receive every consideration from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. It was clear that if Parliament had not interfered they would have derived this addition to their miserable stipends during the life of the present Bishop. He, therefore, thought that if Parliament interfered, they ought not to do so at the expense of their incomes.

MR. RIDLEY said, he hoped those claims would not be lost sight of by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, who had the large sum of at least £450,000 in their hands, and yet spent but little of that in the augmentation of small livings.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, the Report of the Commissioners, which was about to be produced, entered fully into the subject.

MR. CARDWELL said, that as one of the Commissioners, he hoped that nothing that had passed in the present discussion would be understood as committing them, and that the Committee would reserve their opinion upon it until they had read the Report.

Clause agreed to; as also was Clause 4.

On Clause 5. Every Bishop who shall succeed to the dioceses of London and Durham respectively shall hold his See, and all the property, patronage, and rights belonging thereto subject to any provision which shall be made by the authority of Parliament within the space of three years next after the passing of the present Act, "any Law, Statute, or Canon to the contrary notwithstanding."

MR. ROEBUCK: As it stood at present the clause provided that any future appointed Bishops of the two sees mentioned in the Bill should be subject to any provision which might be made "by Parliament within three years after the passing of this Act." He would propose to strike out those words, and insert in lieu thereof, "by the authority of Parliament relating to the extent of his duty or the amount of his emoluments."

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, that he hoped the hon. and learned Member would not press his Amendment, as his right hon. Friend (Sir G. Grey) intended to propose a somewhat similar emendation upon the third reading. The Amendment of his right hon. Friend did not, however, propose to deal with the limitation of three years.

MR. HADFIELD said, he thought that if this provision, limiting the time to three years, were not got rid of, the clause would be valueless.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he would suggest that the advisability or non-advisability of retaining the limitation of three years would be better discussed to-morrow, when the Amendment to which he had referred was before the House.

MR. ROEBUCK said, he would remind the Committee that they would discuss the subject upon the third reading, under the disadvantage of being able to speak once only. He did not wish to obstruct the progress of business, but he thought it right to place the fact before hon. Members.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, he took exception to the last phrase, as at best unmeaning, and as possibly calculated to create some difficulty in the interpretation of the clause. He did not profess to be learned in the Ecclesiastical Law, but there was upon the Treasury Bench one hon. and learned Gentleman, the Solicitor General, who ought to be proficient in the science, having devoted a whole hour to it that day, and he should be glad to be informed by him what was the meaning of the word "canon" as used in the clause.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, he would willingly give the noble Lord the benefit of his opinion as regarded the application of the three words "law, statute, and canon." The first was used with reference to the Common Law, the second with reference to Acts of Parliament, and the third with reference to the Ecclesiastical Law. But the whole phrase was, as every one must be aware, little else than surplusage—mere words, of course.

MR. ROEBUCK: The hon. and learned Gentleman follows the precedent of former Bills, and trudges on in a beaten track.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL: Allow me to assure the hon. and learned Member that he is mistaken in supposing that I framed the Bill. I never saw it till it came down from the House of Lords.

MR. GLADSTONE said, that, strictly speaking, both the words excepted to by the noble Lord, and even the entire clause, he considered were unnecessary. They had no enacting power, and were only introduced to save the honour of Parliament.

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, he still objected to the words, and should move that they be omitted.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he must beg the noble Lord not to press the Motion; though the words might be unnecessary, they were justified by precedent, and, at all events, could do no harm.

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, he would consent to withdraw the Motion, but he should renew it to-morrow.

Clause agreed to.—On the Preamble,

SIR WILLIAM HEATHCOTE said, he must protest against the supposition that he approved of the Preamble in its present form. An Amendment would probably be proposed to-morrow.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he wished to know whether it was intended to propose any material Amendments in the Bill on the third reading? If so, notice of them should be given that evening, as there only remained four days of the Session.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, that the only Amendment contemplated was the technical one of substituting the words "that he has under his hand and seal" for the words "duly and canonically, with reference to the manner in which the Archbishop of Canterbury should accept the resignation of the outgoing Bishops.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he deemed that Amendment a very important one, and would oppose it.

Lord Robert Cecil

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that his hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General would state to-morrow the grounds upon which he rested his Amendment.

MR. ROEBUCK said, his objection to the Preamble as it stood now was that it was not a true one; and he wanted to know whether the Government were prepared to make it accord with the facts? At present it stated facts about the resignation which never occurred. The dates were made very different from the actual dates. The Bishops had offered to resign upon condition of having certain sums as retiring pensions, but that was not stated, though it ought to be, in the Preamble.

MR. GLADSTONE said, that to any Amendment which proposed to strike out the words "duly and canonically" he should, when it came to be considered, offer every opposition in his power. At the same time, deferring as he did to the sense of the Committee which had been unequivocally pronounced, he had no wish whatever to obstruct the Bill.

Preamble agreed to.—House resumed.

' METROPOLIS LOCAL MANAGEMENT ACT AMENDMENT (No. 2) BILL

Order for consideration of Lords Amendments read.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That the said Amendments be now read."

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he must press for the postponement of the Order, on the ground that an hon. Friend of his had a petition against the Bill, and was not able to be present to lay it before the House.

SIR BENJAMIN HALL declined to accede to the suggestion.

MR. BUTLER objected to the haste with which these Amendments were being hurried; he entertained strong objections to them, and he had reason to believe that there was a general feeling throughout the metropolis against them,—true it had not been strongly expressed, but these Amendments had only been placed in the hands of Members the previous morning, when it appeared that they were of a nature seriously to interfere with the rights of the ratepayers, to choose their own churchwardens and parochial officers—500,000 ratepayers were to be deprived of their rights, the alteration was uncalled for, and unless the right hon. Baronet would consent to postpone the consideration of these Amendments, he should move that the further consideration be postponed till to-morrow.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the words "That the" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "consideration of such Amendments be postponed till To-morrow."

SIR BENJAMIN HALL said, the only Amendment proposed by the Lords related to the appointment of parochial officers. That Amendment was contained in the first clause, and he believed that was the only point to which the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Butler) referred. Under the Act of last Session the Vestries were elected an by almost universal suffrage, namely, by a rate-paying suffrage. One-third went out by rotation every year, and there was household suffrage with single voting. The Lords thought that bodies so constituted had the confidence of the ratepayers, and that they might be intrusted with the election of the parochial officers, rather than that there should be a recurrence of those exciting scenes which had occasionally taken place. In most of the parishes the vestries elected the churchwardens, overseers, and other parochial officers. In other parishes they were elected by the parishioners at large, and the object of the Lords' Amendments was to assimilate the practice.

MR. PELLATT complained that the Lords' Amendments would destroy the whole vitality of the Bill. Parishes now in the enjoyment of open vestries would not like the measure, and he should move the omission of the Lords' Amendments so far as they went to extinguish the first clause.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, there was no right which the inhabitants of the metropolis valued more than the ancient right of electing their parochial officers. In some parishes there were 20,000 ratepayers who would have the right to vote for those parochial officers, while the largest number of members in any vestry was not more than 120. The ratepayers did not wish to delegate this right of election to the vestries. The first clause of the Bill which had been expunged by the Lords was the very part of the measure which was viewed with the greatest satisfaction by the inhabitants of the metropolis, and he certainly hoped that the House would not agree to its being expunged.

SIR WILLIAM CLAY said, there was much that was good in the Bill, which he was sorry to see rejected. After the passing of this Bill a church rate could only be made in open vestry, which he thought a very great point. Another important object of the Bill was to dispense with the necessity of the payment of church rates to entitle a person to the enjoyment of the elective franchise. If his hon. Friend's object was to defeat the Bill by postponing the consideration of the Lords' Amendments to-morrow, he feared he must vote against him.

MR. WILKINSON said, that at a meeting of parochial officers, held a few days since, there was a general expression of opinion that sooner than lose the Bill the first clause should be struck out. As he understood that the clause inserted by the Lords could not be struck out, and the original clause inserted, he should not offer any opposition to the Bill as it stood.

MR. MURROUGH said, that a great number of the Members for the metropolis looked upon the first clause as the only valuable part of the Bill; and, notwithstanding what had fallen from the hon. Member for Lambeth (Mr. Wilkinson) who had shown less discretion in the matter than his hon. Colleague, he could assure the House, from his acquaintance with the constituency of Lambeth, that that feeling was shared by a great proportion of that constituency. The right hon. Baronet opposite would not be showing that moral courage which, from his general political conduct, might be expected from him, if he did not move that the Lords' Amendment for expunging Clause 1 be not agreed to.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

MR. BUTLER admitted the necessity for legislation, and that there were useful clauses in the Bill; but the Amendments materially affected the rights of his constituents, rights which they valued; he should therefore move that the Amendment of the Lords to expunge Clause 1, be not agreed to.

MR. MURROUGH seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question put, "That this House doth disagree with the Lords in the Amendment in page 1, 'Leave out Clause T.'"

The House divided:—Ayes 8; Noes 53: Majority 45.

Amendment agreed to:—Several others agreed to; one agreed to, with an Amendment.

FORMATION, &c., OF PARISHES BILL.

THE MARQUESS OF BLANDFORD said, he would beg to move that the Lords' Amendments should be agreed to. At the same time he must confess that he very much regretted that the clause which permitted the application of voluntary offerings towards the endowment of the clergy had been rejected from the Bill. He felt very strongly on the subject of that clause; nevertheless, he felt it might, at that late period of the Session, endanger the passing of the Bill if he were to insist upon its reinsertion. He should, therefore, content himself with expressing his complete adhesion to the principle of the clause, and he hoped that on a future occasion the subject would be again taken up.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he was very glad to hear the observations of his noble Friend. He confessed he felt they were placed in a very unfortunate position. The clause had been inserted in the Bill with the unanimous approval of a Select Committee, and it had passed through that House without a division. However, it went up to the House of Lords at the end of the Session and it was rejected by a Majority of two Peers in a House of only forty Members. Although the majority against the clause was no larger, he quite agreed with his noble Friend, that as it was within a few days of the end of the Session, it would endanger the passing of the Bill if they were to insist on its reinsertion. At the same time, having regard to the unequivocal expression of opinion in that House in favour of the principle of the clause, he trusted that at a future time attention would be again attracted to the subject.

THE NEW PALACE AT WESTMINSTER— DECAY OF THE STONE-WORK—THE PATENT LAWS.

LORD LYNTHURST presented a petition from Mr. John Benjamin Daines, of Argyll Street, Hanover Square, London, gentleman, the inventor of a solution for preventing the decomposition of stonework exposed to atmospheric action, praying for an inquiry into its efficacy, and if found successful, that their Lordships would accept the use of it for national purposes. The noble and learned Lord stated that some parts of the stonework of the Houses of Parliament were in a state of considerable decomposition, and that, two years ago, Sir Charles Barry permitted Mr. Daines to apply his solution to three portions of the building, covering altogether a surface of 1,400 square yards, Sir Charles having intimated to him that he could not give a certificate as to its merits until after the lapse of two years. That period had now expired, and Mr. Daines received yesterday from Sir Charles Barry a certificate stating that he was perfectly satisfied with the efficiency of the solution, and that it had not only preserved the stonework to which it had been applied, but had checked the decay in those portions where decomposition had commenced at the time of application. He therefore wished to know whether the Government would have any objection to appoint two or three of their Lordships for the purpose of investigating the subject? He also availed himself of that opportunity to ask the noble and learned Lord on the woolsack, whether it was the intention of the Government to introduce a measure with respect to the patent laws, which were now in a very unsatisfactory state?

THE LORD CHANCELLOR quite concurred with the noble and learned Lord that the state of the law of patents and inventions was anything but satisfactory. The matter underwent investigation before a Committee of their Lordships' House some few years ago, and also, he believed, before a Committee of the other House of Parliament; they recommended some material changes, and the present system had been established in conformity with the changes so suggested. He had often had the subject under his own consideration, and he felt that the law was in a very discreditable state. He would again look into the matter; but seeing that it was beset by almost insurmountable difficulties, he was not prepared to say that he would introduce a measure next Session.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY said it was hardly possible to institute an inquiry into the merits of Mr. Daines' invention by a Committee at this period of the Session.

LORD LYNTHURST said, he did not think the inquiry would occupy more than two or three hours at the outside. The decomposition of the stonework had commenced, to a very considerable extent, over different parts of the building, and no time ought to be lost in taking some step to prevent the continuance of the evil.

INDIA.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE moved for Returns connected with the land-tax of Bengal, Behar, Orissa, and Benares; of Indian officers employed in civil and political duties in 1847 and 1855; of the covenanted civil servants in actual employ in 1834, 1847, and 1855; of the same absent on furlough; of their total number, and their salaries. The noble Marquess said that he did not move for the Returns with the view of eliciting any expression of opinion on the subject at the present period of the Session, but in the hope that the Government of India would receive the full consideration of Parliament in the next Session. The first Return for which he had moved was, in fact, a return of the number of estates confiscated to the Government. He would not go into the question of how far those confiscations could be defended on the ground of public morality. All he asked was a return of the number confiscated, and he hoped he would not be told that the Return was too lengthy to be made. With regard to the civil service, he understood the Governor General had been obliged, in consequence of the paucity of civil servants, to call upon officers of the Indian army to perform civil and political duties. This was a fact which concerned the efficiency of the army as well as the civil service, and another question also arose—namely, whether officers of Her Majesty's army were not entitled to perform those duties as well as officers of the Indian army. The result of the present system was, that judicial functions were given to men who did not know the language of the persons whom they had to try, and that a boy from Haileybury, who was entered as an assistant, really found himself with authority to administer judicial functions. All he asked was, that the House should know how many of these officers there were. He begged also to move that the Return of the law expenditure in England of the East India Company since the year 1853, ordered to be laid before the House on the 16th June, be made forthwith. He believed it would be found that the law expenses of the East India Company in England were something monstrous, and would reveal a spirit of litigation which was not creditable on the part of a sovereign Power towards those whose territory and revenues had become absorbed in the possessions of the Crown. He believed the number of appeals would not be nearly so great if the Courts of India were tolerably well constituted, or if a spirit of litigation and oppression did not exist which induced the civil servants of the Company to commence proceedings, and involve the Indian Government in lawsuits that few of the natives were able to resist. In many of these cases the East India Company had been signally, and, he might say, disgracefully worsted. If there was no objection, he would likewise move for copies of any Minute of the East Indian Government in 1834, specifying the terms and conditions of the allowance to be made to the deposed Rajah of Coorg. He could not understand upon what ground it was that the East India Company required this deposed Prince to spend his income in India. His stipend amounted to the paltry sum of £448 per annum, less than was paid by the Company for a dinner at the London Tavern, or for a fee to counsel for arguing an appeal. The sum was even less than the salary of the Directors, and it was impossible to arrive at any other conclusion than this, that the Company wanted this gentleman to be turned out of the country, in order that he might not be able to prosecute his legal suit against them.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, that he had stated on a former occasion that the Government did not feel itself called upon to defend the course which had been taken by the East India Company. It happened with respect to the payment of pensions, that the law and constitution had entrusted the East India Company with a very large discretion, and this was a point on which the Government had no right to interfere. This prince had obtained leave for a year, and at the expiration of that period the Company had required him to return to India.

Returns ordered to be laid before the House.

JUDICIAL REFLECTIONS ON MEMBERS OF THE HOUSE—JUDGMENT IN RE DYCE SOMBRE—QUESTION.

EARL ST. VINCENT rose to put to the Lord Privy Seal the Question of which he had given notice:—Whether, inasmuch as the Judgments of the highest Legal Tribunals are Matters of Public Record, and may be referred to as Facts in the Knowledge of Government, and considering the severe Censures that have been passed in Three successive Judgments, pronounced by the late Lord Chancellor Cottenham, by Sir John Dodson, Judge of the Prerogative Court of Canterbury, and by the Judicial Committee of Privy Council, upon the Conduct of a Noble Member of this House holding the Situation of Constable of the Tower of London, and also a distinguished Office near Her Majesty's Person, Her Majesty's Government have thought proper, for the due Preservation of the high Character of this House, to take any Steps in reference thereto? or if they intend so to do? The noble Earl requested that their Lordships, in indulgence to his infirmities, would permit the clerk at the table to read extracts from the judgments referred to, which was accordingly done.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said, that Her Majesty's Government was not prepared to institute any proceedings in this matter. He must deprecate the discussion of circumstances which had occurred in a civil suit—circumstances which related to a noble Lord who had been no party to that suit—and who had had no opportunity of being heard in his defence. At the same time, whilst Her Majesty's Government was not prepared to institute any such proceedings, it must be understood that it expressed no opinion as to the opinions stated in these judgments, or the opinions which successive Judges had pronounced as to the conduct of this noble Lord. If it were necessary to institute any proceeding, it ought to be one to enable the noble Lord to come forward in his own defence and state his whole case. He had had no such opportunity; and, under these circumstances, the Government was not prepared to take that course which the noble Earl opposite seemed to think they should. He (the Marquess of Lansdowne) appreciated the motives which induced the noble Earl to bring the subject forward—that warm affection which he must bear to his nearest and dearest relative—a most distinguished and accomplished lady; but, believing that no good could result from any proceeding, he trusted that the matter would be suffered to drop.

EARL ST. VINCENT said, that the noble Marquess was under an erroneous impression in thinking that Lord Combermere had had no opportunity of being heard in his defence, for that he (Earl St. Vincent) had given to Lord Combermere early notice of what he intended doing, and had subsequently forwarded to him a copy of the question when he had determined upon that course. He would give every consideration to the suggestion of the noble Marquess that this matter should be suffered to drop; but, as a matter of precaution, he would notice that on an early day on the ensuing Session he would move that copies of these judgments be laid on the table with a view to further proceedings, feeling a strong conviction that these public judicial censures for a contempt of Court ought not to pass unnoticed.

House adjourned till To-morrow.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, July 25, 1856.

MINUTES.] NEW MEMBER SWORN.—For Frome, Hon. William George Boyle.

NEW WRITS.—For Kerry County, v. Viscount Castlerosse, Comptroller of the Household; for Nottingham Borough, v. The Right Hon. Edward Strutt, Steward of Hempholme.

PUBLIC BILLS.—1^o Aberdeen Colleges.

PENSIONS—QUESTION.

MR. BOWYER asked the hon. Gentleman the Secretary of the Treasury by what Act of Parliament, or other authority, or upon what ground, two pensions to Caroline Cort and Catherine Liddon, for £25 each per annum, had been reduced to £19 each per annum, being 25 per cent, or £315 sterling, during the last 25 years?

MR. WILSON replied that these pensions were originally granted at £25 6s. per annum, but they were subject to charges amounting to £6 6s. In the 2nd and 3rd year of the reign of William IV. it was enacted that in future pensions should be paid net; and when these pensions were renewed, at the commencement of the reign of Her present Majesty, they were granted at their net amount.

MR. ROEBUCK asked whether the original sums had been debited against the Civil List since these pensions were reduced?

MR. WILSON could not answer that question.

MR. BOWYER asked the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he did not consider that when the Legislature provided that small pensions were to be paid without deductions it intended this to be for the benefit of the poor pensioners, and not to lead to a saving of the public funds?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the hon. Gentleman was as capable of forming an opinion of the intention of the Legislature as he was. All the Government had to look to was the warrant by which the pensions were granted.

MR. ROEBUCK wished to know whether the State was debited with the full amount of these pensions. He wanted to find out whether anybody pocketed the difference.

MR. WILSON replied that a considerable portion of this deduction went into the annual revenue of the country; some went as fees to the Exchequer officers. The civil list was debited with the exact amount paid, and no more.

MR. ROEBUCK asked what the fees were?

MR. WILSON promised to make a return of these fees if the hon. Member would move for it.

MR. ROEBUCK said, he would move for the return on Monday next.

THE ARMY—QUESTION.

COLONEL NORTH asked the President of the Board of Control whether all appointments in India for which the officers of the Indian army were eligible would be thrown open to those of Her Majesty's army?

MR. V. SMITH replied that many of the appointments in question had already been opened to officers of the Queen's army, and other relaxations in the same direction were contemplated; but there were certain appointments which, owing to the character of the duties annexed to them, could not be filled with efficiency by other officers than those of the Indian army.

THE MAIL SERVICE—QUESTION.

MR. H. G. LANGTON asked the Secretary to the Treasury whether it was intended, previously to their entering upon the service, to test the speed of the steam-vessels proposed to be employed under a recent contract in the conveyance of the Australian mails, seeing that, by the copies of the tenders now before the House, the time occupied by the voyage from Suez to Melbourne would require a speed of eleven or eleven and a-half knots an hour, whereas the vessels tendered for the performance of the duty were set down at a speed of nine and three-quarter knots per hour only?

MR. WILSON said, that the vessels would be surveyed on behalf of the Government by an officer of the Admiralty, but it was not intended to make any preliminary test of their speed, the principle on which the contracts were framed being, that the parties who took them bound themselves under heavy penalties, which were invariably enforced, to perform the service within a stated period. The whole responsibility, therefore, rested on the contractors. The vessels had been already in the service of the Government, and were favourably reported on by the departments which had employed them.

MR. H. G. LANGTON inquired whether, in order to insure the regular performance of the contract for conveying the mails between Suez and Australia, any clause would be introduced by which the contract would be forfeited in the event of the service not being performed within the maximum number of days tendered for—namely, thirty-nine days outwards, and thirty-five days homeward?

MR. WILSON replied that, in the event of the service not being performed within the stipulated period, the parties would be liable to the heavy penalties to which he had already alluded. Moreover, there was in this contract a clause enabling Government to put an end to the engagement at any time if they should be dissatisfied with the manner in which the service was carried on.

THE PATENTS OF SECRETARIES OF STATE—QUESTION.

In reply to Mr. MURROUGH,

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER observed that the law officers of the Crown had given an opinion to the effect that it was desirable that the usage heretofore followed with respect to the obligation of Secretaries of State to take out patents for their office should be maintained, and as long as the law remained unchanged that practice would be adhered to.

MR. MURROUGH inquired whether, that being the case, it was to be understood that such Secretaries of State as had neglected to pay for their patents would do so now?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Assuredly. All the Secretaries of State now in office will take out their patents.

THE REPORT OF THE CHELSEA COMMISSIONERS—QUESTION.

MR. LAYARD: I am anxious to put to the noble Lord at the head of the Government a question of some importance, and I venture to hope that the House will kindly permit me to preface it with a few explanatory observations. It will be in the recollection of hon. Members that about a year ago my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck) moved for the appointment of a Committee, popularly known as "the Crimean Committee." The noble Lord the First Minister of the Crown endeavoured to prevail upon the House not to grant that Committee, and, to make his appeal the more persuasive, he undertook that he would himself institute an investigation into the disasters which befell our army, see that justice was done to the country and to our soldiers who perished before Sebastopol, and, in a word, be our leader. By way of redeeming this promise two very eminent officers were sent out to the Crimea, where they prosecuted their inquiry with great zeal and energy. They had at hand all requisite means for carrying on the investigation; they took copious evidence, and on returning to this country prepared a Report, which was laid upon the table of this House. In consequence of the statements contained in that Report I gave notice of my intention to bring forward a Motion expressive of the deep regret of this House that honours, rewards, and promotion should have been bestowed on the inculpatated officers. Thereupon the noble Lord expressed his willingness to advise Her Majesty to appoint a military commission to inquire into the Report of the Crimean Commissioners. This offer having been made I withdrew my notice of Motion, and refrained from taking any further steps in the matter, for my only object was that full and complete justice should be done to all parties. That Committee has sat, and its Report has been laid on the table of the House. I shall forbear from saying anything as to the feelings with which the country has received the Report that has emanated from that military commission. The document has been laid upon the table at a period of the Session which precludes the possibility of its receiving from this House that deliberate consideration which the importance of the subject merits. But I find that, speaking of the inquiry which they were commanded to institute, the Commissioners used these words :—

"It appears to us to be attended with unusual difficulties, inasmuch as some of the statements which were to be inquired into were founded in part on evidence which we had not the means of investigating, and the attendance of several witnesses which it would have been desirable to examine could not be obtained."

After clearing from all shadow of imputation the officers whom the Crimean Commission had inculpatated, and declaring that they were quite guiltless, the Commissioners concluded their Report as follows :—

"We beg leave further humbly to submit to your Majesty that there does not appear to us any ground for further proceedings thereon."

GENERAL PEEL: I rise to order.

MR. LAYARD: Upon that point I will not longer dwell; but it is at least certain that Colonel Tulloch had no opportunity of defending himself, not having been present when the inculpatated officers were under examination. Now, the question I should like to ask of the noble Lord is, whether he is himself satisfied with this Report—whether he thinks that it does justice to this House and to the country—and, above all, to the memory of those gallant men who suffered and died for us in the Crimea and at Scutari—and, finally, whether he is willing to endorse what I cannot but regard as the somewhat uncalled-for opinion of the Commissioners that there are no grounds for further proceedings in this matter?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: The questions of the hon. Gentleman appear to me somewhat unusual, for he requires not a statement of facts, but an expression of opinion. I must object to one portion of the hon. Gentleman's observations—that in which he stated or implied that the Board of General officers which sat at Chelsea was appointed to inquire into and report on the proceedings of the Crimean Commission. This is not an accurate statement of the case. The purpose for which the Board of General Officers, which sat at Chelsea, was appointed, was to receive explanations from certain officers who felt that their conduct had been brought into question by certain passages in the Report of the Crimean Commissioners. It was to afford to those officers an opportunity of exculpation, and not to re-investigate the Report of the latter Commissioners, that the Chelsea Commission was instituted. The hon. Member says that he has read their Report, but allow me to inquire whether he has read the evidence on which that Report is based?

MR. LAYARD: I have.

LORD PALMERSTON: In that case the hon. Gentleman is qualified to pronounce an opinion on the question; but I do not believe that the majority of this House has enjoyed the same advantage. In conclusion, I have only to observe that it is not the intention of Her Majesty's Government to found any further proceedings on the Report of the Chelsea Commissioners.

BISHOPS OF LONDON AND DURHAM RETIREMENT BILL.

Bill read 3^o.

MR. HADFIELD condemned the clause in the Bill which restricted the time within which it should be competent for the Government to effect a readjustment of the diocese, revenues, and patronage of the see of London, to a period of three years.

SIR G. GREY explained, and defended the provision thus impugned.

MR. ROEBUCK said, that supposing the dowager Bishop—if he might so term him—died, and a Bill dealing with the diocese of London were introduced, and it shared the fate of so many of the noble Lord's measures—namely, was massacred among the other innocents—at the end of three years the Legislature would find this enactment an obstacle to any contemplated improvement. The power of Parliament was theoretically unlimited, so much so that De Lolme had remarked that it could do anything but convert a female child into a male one. Practically, however, the case was very different, and the objection that they were flying in the face of an Act of Parliament could always be used with effect.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON observed, that, if a Bishop had held his see for a series of years, it was natural that he should think it hard on him to make an arrangement considerably curtailing his patronage and emoluments, and extensively changing his position. This clause, however, had been inserted perhaps from over caution. It was scarcely necessary, inasmuch as whoever succeeded to the see would receive his appointment on the understanding that he would be subject to any change, within reasonable limits, which Parliament might make. It was too late then to alter the clause; but supposing a Bill to be brought in, and to fail in being carried until the three years had expired, the Bishop would of course have received previous notice of the new arrangement that had been contemplated; and in any subsequent attempt at legislation this circumstance would, doubtless, be fairly considered.

MR. KINNAIRD suggested that the clause should be amended in the other House.

On the Motion of MR. HENLEY, the following was inserted in lieu of the original preamble:—

“Whereas it is expedient to make provision for certain annual sums to be paid in case of the resignation of the Right Hon. and Right Rev. Charles James Lord Bishop of London, and the Right Rev. Edward, Lord Bishop of Durham, respectively.”

Bill passed, with the Amendment.

MR. ROEBUCK said, that he had a remark to make on the question as to affixing the title to the Bill.

MR. SPEAKER said, that this was a Lords' Bill, the title to which was never affixed by the Commons.

MR. ROEBUCK: In that case, he would speak on the question that the Clerk take the Bill to the other House. He had a right to complain of the conduct of the noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston) towards him. The noble Lord doubtless did not intend anything disrespectful to him, but the fact was nevertheless the same. When he (Mr. Roebuck) yesterday proposed an alteration in Committee, the noble Lord stated that he fully agreed with him, and promised that the alteration should be made on the third reading. But the Bill had now been read a third time and that promise was not fulfilled.

PUBLIC BUSINESS—REVIEW OF THE SESSION.

MR. DISRAELI rose, pursuant to notice, to move for a “return of the number of Public Bills, and their titles, the orders for which, in any of their stages, had been discharged during the present Session, and the date of the discharge of each of such orders;” and said:—Sir, I have thought it expedient, before we disperse, to ask the House to consider the course of public business during the present Session of Parliament—I take this step, Sir, with no intention of preferring a Bill of indictment against those who are mainly responsible for the management of public affairs in this House. I do not hold the opinion that the last day of the Session affords either the most convenient or the fairest occasion for the prosecution of a party attack; and I should not now make the Motion which I am about to place in your hands, Sir, were I not convinced that there are great evils and even great dangers connected with our present position; and did I not believe that in the course of this discussion some suggestions may, perhaps, be thrown out which may, during the recess, exercise an influence upon the public mind, and lead to the application—when we meet again—of some remedy for the grievances to which I am about to advert. Sir, the course which I am now taking is not unprecedented, but it is far from being a usual weapon in party warfare. Indeed, on looking for precedents, I am not aware that there is more than one instance to which I can call the attention of the House, in the way of authority; and it scarcely becomes me to refer to that instance, because the precedent was furnished by myself. In the year 1848 I felt it my duty to ask the House to consider the course of business during the Session which was then about to close. I think, Sir, that reference will acquit me, or anybody else, of indulging in the dangerous habit of taking advantage of occasions of this description to disturb the serenity which should attend the last hours of our companionship—or of having seized such opportunities to express opinions adverse to Ministers—a course which I should prefer taking during the progress of the Session, when, if defeated in argument unfairly, one might recur to the subject, and when the Government would be afforded no excuse for saying that at the termination of their labours they had been called upon unexpectedly to vindicate proceedings which a single opportunity did not permit them completely to defend. In the year 1848 I made a Motion similar to that which now lies upon the table, and I think I may be acquitted of having been upon that occasion actuated by any party feeling, inasmuch as the Gentlemen who then sat upon the Ministerial benches had but recently attained their seats there, and had obtained them mainly by the efforts of myself and my friends. It was, then, neither with the object of disturbing those Gentlemen in the occupation of those benches, or of damaging their reputation with the country, that in the year 1848 I felt called upon, owing to the exigency of the subject, to ask the House of Commons fairly to consider what had been accomplished during the progress of the Session which was then just about to terminate. That

Session of 1848 was of a duration, I believe, unparalleled in the annals of Parliament. The House of Commons had sat for ten consecutive months, and when those ten months were concluded, it is not to be denied that the account of our labours proved them to have been of a very fruitless character. Great dissatisfaction and great discontent, as a consequence, prevailed throughout the country. Many reasons were assigned and many causes alleged in explanation of the fact that so prolonged a sitting had been productive of results so unsatisfactory and so slight. It was said then—and this was a very favourite mode of accounting for the mortifying fact—that it was to be attributed to the forms of the House, which, it was contended, were not suited to the age in which we lived or to the proper discharge of the multifarious transactions with which we had to cope. Again, it was said that another cause which produced these unsatisfactory results was, the too protracted discussions which took place in this House; it was said, that there existed too great a desire upon the part of Members of the House to give expression to their sentiments, and that they exhibited too much eagerness to debate the questions which were submitted to our consideration. Now, it appears to me that both those allegations have at all times a very dangerous tendency; but I think that tendency was especially dangerous in the year 1848, because the Parliament of that day was a young Parliament. There were then, I believe, 280 new Members in the House, and nothing, in my opinion, is more to be deprecated than that Gentlemen who have but recently entered within these walls, and who consequently cannot have any great experience as to the mode in which our proceedings are conducted, should be led to suppose that any standing order or form of the House presented an obstacle to the satisfactory prosecution of the business of the nation. Those who are better acquainted with the proceedings of the House know that its forms have been adopted after deep consideration and mature experience, and that the first of the allegations to which I have just adverted has little or no foundation. The second allegation is, that hon. Members are too prone to discuss the questions which come before them; and that is a charge which ought to be regarded with no small degree of suspicion. I say this because what, after all, is the House of Commons if it be not a House of discussion? It is a House of Parliament. Its very name denotes its character. It is a House of free and ample speech, and whatever question may arise as to the policy of our legislation, however little our wisdom may be thought of, or the labours of our Committees appreciated, I have ever held the opinion, and that opinion I still continue to maintain, that the main claim which we possess upon the confidence, and, as I hope, upon the affections of the people of this great empire is, that there prevails in the country a general and well-founded conviction that there exists in England at least one place in which, in the long run, truth will be always elicited. Well, Sir, so anxious, and so naturally anxious, were the Government in the year 1848 to avail themselves of any plausible excuse to divert from themselves the rising odium which attended the results of our Parliamentary labours, that the Prime Minister of the day actually proposed and nominated a Committee to inquire into the subject of the forms of the House, to ascertain whether those forms in reality constituted an obstacle to the efficient discharge of the public business; and, if so, how they might be modified in order to facilitate its transaction. The noble Lord the Member for London, who was at the time Prime Minister, was a Member of that Committee; among its other Members were the late Sir Robert Peel, the late Mr. Goulburn, and, if I recollect rightly, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Carlisle (Sir James Graham), and Mr. Cobden. I also was a Member of that Committee, and, if I mistake not, we enjoyed the advantage of the experience and judgment—most valuable in such matters—of the hon. Member for Malton (Mr. E. Denison). We considered the subject with great attention. We examined a member of the American House of Assembly to the rules which were applied to the transaction of public business in the United States. We also examined an illustrious exile who was then residing in this country—who had been Prime Minister of France, and who was a great master of debate—I mean M. Guizot—as to his experience upon the subject of our inquiry; and the result of our deliberations is now among the records of the House. I did not want the information which, as a Member of that Committee, I obtained, to convince me that neither to the forms of the House, nor the freedom of discussion which we enjoy, was the unsatisfactory nature of the progress of the public business during the Session of 1848 to be attributed. It was with such feelings, Sir, and at the desire of many of my friends, that I undertook the laborious task of reviewing a Session which had lasted for ten months; of endeavouring to prove—that neither of the causes alleged had the slightest influence upon the course of public business in Parliament during that Session, and of vindicating—I trust completely—the character of the House of Commons, in reference to the accusations which had been made.

It is with the same objects, and actuated by similar feelings, that I have brought forward this Motion this evening. I do not think it is a Motion that ought to be made, except under circumstances of urgency. It is, in my opinion, of importance that we should discover what the cause is of that general discontent and dissatisfaction with the labours of this House, which could scarcely have been anticipated, but which I think everybody must acknowledge have, within the last six weeks or two months, arisen in the public mind. I do not by any means admit that it ought to be regarded as a matter of course that the Minister of this country should be prone to legislation. I, upon the contrary, maintain that the Minister is the last person in this House who should take an active interference in matters of that kind, upon all occasions. As a general rule, I think it as well that the Minister should not deal with any subject which may require legislation, unless he feels convinced that he can proceed in a manner which will be at once satisfactory and conclusive. I should say that when there arise questions that greatly interest the public mind, although a restless and even in a certain degree a rational feeling may demand legislation with respect to those questions, and although even it is possible that they may be ripe for solution, yet I contend that they may, in many instances with advantage, be left to independent Members of the House for the purpose of initiating preliminary discussion in their case—discussion which, by imparting knowledge and ultimately eliciting truth, may leave those questions in a position to be dealt with ultimately in a satisfactory manner by the Government. Therefore, Sir, I should never think of casting it as an imputation upon any Minister that he was somewhat reserved in matters of legislation, and that he was not prepared to ask the House to sanction measures in connection with great topics, unless he felt convinced that there were urgent reasons for their introduction. I can, moreover, conceive a state of affairs in which a Minister, anxious to do his duty to his Sovereign and to his country, might yet deem it necessary, upon the assembling of this House, to call upon it simply to fulfil the high functions of granting supplies to Her Majesty, and of voting the sums required for the service of the State, to the exclusion of all questions of legislation. The country, for example, might be involved in a great struggle, and I can understand that a Minister might then, notwithstanding that there were matters of internal interest that called for the speedy consideration of Parliament with a view to their settlement, be of opinion that the crisis was of such a nature as to require all the energies of the Government to meet it, and such as to justify the Minister in calculating with confidence upon the temper and forbearance of the public and of Parliament, and not to bring forward those measures. I can also conceive that there may be another situation in which the Minister may be placed, which would call for the exhibition of that temper and that forbearance. We may not be positively at war, but we might be upon the point of concluding a peace by which a great struggle was about to be terminated; and the Minister may then say, "all my energy and all my vigilance are required to carry on the important negotiations which are to close this contest, and to lay the foundation of a settlement that may secure an enduring peace to Europe." In these circumstances I can easily conceive that a Minister might be justified in not appealing to Parliament to pass measures relating to internal affairs, however important, and might simply content himself with asking the House of Commons to vote the supplies necessary for the public service. But of these three pleas, or of any one of them, the noble Viscount opposite cannot avail himself to-night, should he think it right to answer the fair, and I trust not unbecoming criticism, which it is not my main object in rising this evening to make, upon his conduct of the public business during the present Session, but which the nature of my Motion must casually and incidentally elicit. The noble Viscount cannot, in the first place, plead in his own defence to-night, that it is his opinion that we have legislated enough, and that there are no questions of great importance pressing for the consideration of the Legislature. The noble Lord cannot take that course, inasmuch as he has voluntarily, during the present Session, introduced to our notice, not only questions of great importance, but—as I think I shall be able to show the House—a greater number of questions of great importance than probably was ever introduced by any Minister into Parliament. Nor can the noble Lord avail himself of the second plea to which I have adverted, namely, that this country being involved in war—in a formidable struggle—this House or the public could not fairly expect that important legislative proposals should be made. The noble Lord is not entitled to set up that defence, because at the commencement of the Session he advised Her Majesty, while thanking her faithful Commons for the devoted manner in which they had supported her in the late struggle with Russia, to recommend them to give their most attentive consideration to many subjects of great importance in connection with the internal affairs of the nation. The noble Lord, I may add, cannot avail himself of the third plea—that, although the state of war had terminated, the negotiations for peace were of a nature to demand all his energy and vigilance, to the exclusion of the ability to direct his attention to the preparation of great measures of legislation—because, besides those subjects to which the noble Lord advised Her Majesty in Her most gracious Speech to direct our attention, and since the negotiations for peace commenced, the noble Lord has introduced measures upon other subjects, and those of no secondary importance, to which he solicited the consideration of Parliament. I therefore think we need not argue to-night the question whether legislation is or is not necessary in the present circumstances of the country, because Ministers themselves are the principal witnesses to the fact that legislation, and that upon a vast scale, is required.

Now, Sir, in making these observations, I wish to guard myself against the use of any language which could be fairly said to savour, even in the slightest degree, of exaggeration. I have stated that the noble Lord at the head of the Government has, in the course of the present Session of Parliament, introduced to our notice measures of great importance, and a greater number of measures of great importance.

than were ever submitted to Parliament by any Minister who occupied those benches. That assertion I think I shall be able to substantiate. Without mentioning many measures, the magnitude of which, when I refer to them in detail, will speak for itself, but which are of a secondary interest when compared with the principal features of the legislative scheme of this Session, I may be permitted to remind the House of some of the chief subjects which have been laid before us for consideration. We have, in the first place, been asked to create a court of appeal—a high court of appeal; the highest court of appeal in the last resort. Every hon. Member will, I am sure, concur with me in the opinion that that is a subject which may be described as the greatest of legal questions. It may be justly so described in all countries; but in our country it is more than the greatest of legal questions, because it is also the greatest of constitutional questions; because, in considering the creation and construction of a high court of appeal we, from the nature of our institutions, have not only to fulfil that prime object itself, but incidentally to consider the very elements of a senate, or rather of an upper chamber. We have also this year been called upon to deliberate upon a new law of partnership, founded upon new principles—principles better adapted, than those upon which the present law is based, to the exigencies of this advanced age—principles which would facilitate the application of capital to commerce in the most commercial country in the world. We have been asked to take into our consideration the whole law of divorce, and extremely important changes in the law of marriage. We have been called upon to review the whole discipline of the Church—the testamentary jurisdiction of the country—the police of the country—the reform of the most ancient, the most wealthy, and the most powerful of our municipalities, an institution intimately connected with the history and the liberties of England—the superannuation of the whole of the civil service of the country—the criminal appropriation of trust property—the education of the entire kingdom—the retirement of Bishops from their sees—and last, and not least, the accurate means of ascertaining the most important produce of the empire by means of a system of agricultural statistics. Well, Sir, these are no light questions. These are questions not only among the most grave that concern a State, but they involve the very principles upon which society itself depends. Sir, I do not know that I can place the legislative scheme of the Minister more fairly before the House than by referring to the Speech from the Throne at the commencement of the Session, and calling the attention of hon. Members to those propositions which, subsequently, were submitted, upon the authority and with the sanction of the Government, to the consideration of Parliament. There were four subjects—I should rather say four groups of subjects—which, in the heat of war, Her Majesty was advised by the Minister to recommend to the attentive investigation of Parliament. The first, which was the simplest, embraced the assimilation of the mercantile law of Scotland and of England. The second was that improvement in the law of partnership, founded altogether upon new principles, and aiming at the increased application of capital to commerce, to which I have before adverted. The third was a measure which was to relieve the mercantile marine of this mercantile country from charges of great weight under which it had long laboured, and against which loud complaints had been raised. And the fourth series of measures, and the most important, dealt with a large and extensive reform in the laws of Great Britain in the first place, and, in the second place, in those of Ireland. Now, Sir, such was the nature of the legislative scheme which at the commencement of the Session, and in a time of war, was recommended, in the language of the gracious Speech from the Throne to “the attentive consideration” of Parliament. And now, let me ask, have we disposed of the four series of measures to which I have just alluded? With respect to the first question—the assimilation of the mercantile law of England and Scotland—I am ready to admit that the Government may be considered as having fairly redeemed the pledge which they gave in its regard. A Bill to effect a change in the mercantile law of Scotland has now, I believe, passed through both Houses of Parliament. A measure seeking to change the mercantile law of England was also laid before us. It involved, indeed, a principle of the most dangerous character—a principle which aimed at doing away with the necessity in mercantile transactions of written contracts. The practical sagacity, however, of this House protested against that principle, and, with the aid of the whole commercial body, saved the nation from the dangers which would be consequent upon the operation of a proposition so unfortunate. The obnoxious principle was struck out of the Bill, and in that shape the Bill was passed into law. We may, therefore, I think, admit that the Government have, upon the whole, fairly redeemed the pledges which they gave us with respect to the first series of measures which were noticed in the Royal Speech. Now, Sir, did we proceed with regard to those improvements in the law of partnership which we were led to expect—to that measure which was to be founded upon a new principle; which was to be adapted to our advanced and enlightened age; and which in this peculiarly commercial country was to facilitate the application of capital to commerce? Now, I am bound to say that the Government exhibited every evidence of sincerity with respect to this second class of measures, for upon the very first day upon which we met—the 1st of February—the important Bill to which I allude was introduced by the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Board of Trade. After discussion—after being amended and reprinted on the 25th February—upon the 10th of March that measure was abandoned. Her Majesty's Government, however, determined to deal with a subject which they felt to be of paramount importance, lost no time in profiting by the discussion which had taken place, and accordingly, upon the 7th of April, a second Bill to amend the law of partnership, and to accomplish the great objects for whose attainment its predecessor had been framed, was introduced into the House of Commons by the same right hon. Gentleman. It was introduced on the 7th of April. Upon the 14th of July it was abandoned. Now, as my object is not to prefer a Bill of indictment against the Minister—my aim being a higher one, as I trust I shall be able to substantiate—I must call the attention of the House to this fact. Here we have an important subject recommended to our attentive consideration in the Speech from the Throne. We have a Bill brought in with regard to it by Her Majesty's Ministers and abandoned. But that is not all. A second measure is introduced, and that also is abandoned. Now that is a very remarkable, and, I cannot help thinking, a very unfortunate catastrophe for the Minister of any public department to experience; but what I would now take the liberty of observing to the House is, that such a catastrophe is not peculiar to the Vice President of the Board of Trade, hitherto thought to be so peculiarly unfortunate in his legislative enterprises. I find that the President of the Poor Law Board was not much more successful. Upon the 3rd of April that functionary introduced to our notice a Bill for the amendment of the poor law. Upon the 23rd of May that measure was abandoned. I find the Minister—profiting equally with his right hon. Colleague by experience—re-introducing this Bill, or rather introducing a new measure upon the subject of the poor law, on the 23rd of May. On the 10th of July I find that measure also was abandoned. Here, then, we have two Ministers introducing Bills upon subjects of the highest importance, and not only failing in their efforts to carry them, but recurring to the experiment and again encountering failure. But, Sir, this species of double failure is not peculiar either to the Vice President of the Board of Trade or to his right hon. Colleague at the head of the Poor Law Board. The Irish Government, represented in this House by the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, upon the 15th of April introduced a Bill for the better regulation of lunatic asylums in Ireland. Upon the 21st of May that measure was abandoned. The right hon. Gentleman, however, did not lose heart, and accordingly he, two days afterwards, brought in another Bill dealing with the same subject as his former measure. He brought it in on the 23rd of May, and upon the 14th of July it was abandoned. Thus, upon three subjects—and I have mentioned the last two cases incidentally to illustrate and in some degree to soften the position of the Vice President of the Board of Trade—upon three subjects of moment we find three Ministers trying their hands at legislation and failing in their efforts; not despairing in consequence of one failure, but making a second attempt, once more to be unsuccessful. Thus much, then, Sir, for the law of partnership. Let me now direct the attention of the House to the third group of measures referred to in the gracious Speech from the Throne—namely, those measures which were to relieve the whole mercantile marine of England from those local dues and passing tolls so long matters of grievance to that body. Here, Sir, I am afraid I shall not find any of the cat-leagues of the Vice President of the Board of Trade to be his equals in mischance. I find, upon the 4th of February, the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Board of Trade, I am sorry to say, bringing in a Bill to carry out the objects alluded to in the Royal Speech with reference to the subject I have just mentioned. Upon the 26th of February that measure was abandoned. I come now to the fourth series of measures referred to in the Royal Speech. There are, first, the measures for the improvement of the law in Great Britain. It appears, as far as I can ascertain, that five measures were brought forward by Her Majesty's Government with that praiseworthy object, and I think, when I state their titles, hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House will agree with me that no Ministry ever yet brought forward a series of measures on subjects of such deep interest and extensive application. First, there was a Bill to establish a new jurisdiction in matters of wills and administrations throughout the country. That Bill was introduced on the 14th of March; and on the 10th of July it was abandoned. The next Bill was that great measure to found an appellate jurisdiction in the last resort. It was brought from the Lords on the 9th of June; and on the 10th of July it was abandoned. The third measure related to a subject of no less importance than that of divorce. It was brought into this House on the 4th of July; and just let me remind the House of the circumstances under which it came down to us. It had passed with great difficulty through the House of Lords, where it had been subjected to the criticism of some of the greatest intellects of the country. It dealt, I believe successfully, with most of the points which are the opprobrium of our law of marriage, and it laid the foundation of a satisfactory adjustment of those points which it did not profess to settle. That Bill was introduced into this House on the 4th of July; and on the 17th of July it was abandoned. The next measure of this character—a measure of legal reform—dealt with a subject on which the present state of our law, I do not hesitate to say, is a disgrace to that enlightened and civilised society to which it is our pride to belong; it was a measure which dealt with the criminal appropriation of trust property. I can conceive no subject more deserving of the attention of a Government. I should say that the nation itself ought never to rest satisfied until the state of the law upon that subject is amended. The most iniquitous consequences have, for a long series of years, resulted from the state of our law upon that subject. I am bound to say—I speak upon the matter on the highest information, and I would not otherwise presume to make the statement—I am bound to say that what is taking place in this country every day renders it still more necessary that a Bill of that kind should be passed. I have not the date when that Bill was introduced into this House; but I have the fatal day before me—the 21st of July when it was abandoned. The fifth measure, which was the Church Discipline Bill, was not abandoned. It was introduced into the other House of Parliament, and there it was rejected on a division. So that none of those five great projects of law, upon subjects which no one can, for a moment, hesitate to admit demand the “attentive consideration” of Parliament—to use Her Majesty's gracious words—and were subjects of urgent necessity, if any subjects for legislation can deserve that name—none of these five great projects have received the sanction of Parliament during the present Session. Now, let us look to the measures proposed, with a view to the reform of the law in Ireland, and let us see whether we have been more fortunate in that respect. Soon after Parliament met, a Bill was introduced by the Government for the reform and reconstruction of the Court of Chancery in Ireland. That measure proposed to create two Vice Chancellors, who were to be appointed by the Lord Lieutenant, at salaries of £3,500 a year each. It proposed to create six chief clerks at salaries of £1,000 a year each, and six junior clerks at salaries of £350 a year each. It proposed to abolish the offices of Masters and Examiners of the Court, and to allow the present functionaries to retire on full salaries—that is to say, the four Masters on salaries of £3,000 a year each, and the other functionaries with corresponding allowances, which I need not mention to the House. This Bill was followed immediately by another, having relation to the Courts of Bankruptcy and Insolvency in Ireland, and which was introduced on the 29th of February. It was proposed by that second Bill to constitute two Judges, with salaries of £2,000 a year each; a chief registrar, with a salary of £600 a year; a chief clerk with a salary of £500 a year; and two assistant registrars with salaries of £400 a year each ; and it conferred the power of pensioning off, at the full salary of £1,200 a year, a gentleman who was once a Member of this House, and who has held his present office for a period of not more than two years. The effect of these Bills, when introduced into the House, was of a startling character. It was first of all, I believe, supposed that this was an ingenious scheme for compensating the sister country for the failure of the Tipperary Bank. That was of course, however, only a superficial view of the case, but it was the popular idea when these Bills were brought before us. Now what happened to these Bills ? The Bill for the reform of the Court of Chancery in Ireland was introduced on the 4th of February ; and on the 1st of July it was abandoned. The Bill to construct a Court of Bankruptcy and Insolvency in Ireland was brought in on the 29th of February ; and on the 17th of July it was abandoned. These, however, were not solitary cases in Irish legislation. There was a Bill with respect to juries in Ireland, which was another of those measures of legal reform. It was introduced on the 5th of February ; and on the 27th of June it was abandoned. There was a Bill with respect to juvenile offenders in Ireland, which also formed part of this great scheme. It was introduced on the 4th of February ; and on the 27th of June it was abandoned. There was a Bill to deal at last with the metropolitan police of Dublin—a subject which had long attracted the attention of Parliament. That Bill was introduced on the 22nd of April ; and on the 1st of July it was abandoned. Thus, you see, that five great measures of legal reform in England, and five great measures of legal reform in Ireland, are introduced by Her Majesty's Government ; and in every case those measures are abandoned. I admit—because I wish to state the case fairly towards the Government—that two measures have been passed for the reform of the law in Ireland, which I think will be highly beneficial ; one is a Bill for the construction of a Court of Appeal in Chancery suits in Ireland, and the name of the other I cannot at this moment remember. But an hon. Friend of mine, who is not now present, stated that these Bills were virtually Bills brought forward by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Enniskillen (Mr. Whiteside). My hon. and learned Friend proposed five considerable measures for the reform of the law and the courts in Ireland, and I am happy to say that I contributed to have those Bills, as well as the Government measures on the same subjects, referred to a Select Committee ; and I believe those Bills of my hon. and learned Friend formed the basis of, and virtually are, the measures which passed through Parliament.

Sir, I have now gone over the four great subjects which were referred to in Her Majesty's Speech from the Throne, and I have placed before the House—and I hope with no rhetorical misrepresentation, for my speech consists entirely of a reference to the records of this House—what has been the result of these projected measures of the Government. But Her Majesty's Government introduced many other measures which cannot be classed in any of the categories referred to in Her Majesty's gracious Speech. Let us see, in the calmest manner and without any comment, by a reference to the records on the table, what has been the fate of those other measures. There was a measure for the superannuation of the members of the Civil Service. That question is not a new one ; it is a question, I admit, of very great difficulty ; it has been for more than twenty years a Parliamentary question, and has taxed the utmost efforts of successive Chancellors of the Exchequer. I had that case before me, and I was prepared to take action upon it. I know that the right hon. Gentleman who was my immediate successor (Mr. Gladstone) gave the utmost attention to it ; and that the right hon. Gentleman who is now Chancellor of the Exchequer is perfectly master of the subject is evident from every observation he has made upon it in this House. It is, therefore, clear, that when Her Majesty's Government determined on grappling at all with the question, they must have done so, not only with the intention, but with the hope of settling it. Now let us see what has been the result. The Civil Service Superannuation Bill was introduced on the 15th of February ; and on the 18th of July it was abandoned—and thus terminated the hopes of a most meritorious and a most ill-used body of Her Majesty's servants. There is another very important question with which Her Majesty's Government determined to deal ; and that, again, is no new question, but one which had long engaged the attention of Parliament—I mean the reform of the Corporation of the City of London. That question has been more or less before Parliament for a period of twenty years. There have been, if I recollect right, two Royal Commissions appointed to investigate that subject, and never were there more ample materials ready than in that case on which legislation might be founded. I may further observe, that the position of the Government with respect to that question was one of unusual favour and advantage, because a colleague of the noble Lord, a Secretary of State (Mr. Labouchere), one of the most distinguished Members of the Cabinet, was, if I am not mistaken, one of the Royal Commissioners on the occasion of the last investigation. When, therefore, Her Majesty's Government resolved at last to act, they had the advantage of having in the Cabinet one who was completely master of the subject; and every one must have anticipated that the measure they would bring forward would be one perfectly adequate to the occasion, fully matured, and thoroughly adapted to the circumstances of the case. The consequence was, that the moment Her Majesty's Government announced that they had a Bill prepared upon that subject, a general feeling prevailed in the House, in the City, and, I may say, in the country, that at last this great reform was to take place. But what has been the fate of that measure? The Bill for the reform of the Corporation of the City of London was introduced on the 4th of February; and on the 26th of June it was abandoned.

I have here, Sir, another catalogue of measures to which I must advert at the risk of wearying the House; but it is of the utmost importance that we should accurately know the data on which any conclusion at which we may arrive upon this subject should be founded. I must now advert to a measure which was brought forward for the local management of the metropolis. It was brought forward by the President of the Board of Works, and he is a man, one would suppose, who knew what he was about. On the 28th of February the Bill was introduced; and on the 9th of May it was abandoned. I now proceed to a department over which another officer—the President of the Board of Health (Mr. Cowper)—presides. The President of the Board of Health was, I believe, originally a member of the profession of Mars. He was, therefore, not to be daunted by the unhappy enterprises of his colleagues. He was resolved to show a martial courage befitting the situation, and when he introduced his Bill on the 26th of May, he stated that he would not abandon it—he demanded battle. The Bill was rejected; and I am sorry to say that, after that fitful blaze of valour, the courage even of my right hon. and gallant Friend seemed to evaporate. On the 26th of May he introduced the Burial Bill; and on the 12th of July it was abandoned. The right hon. Gentleman also introduced a Vaccination Bill on the 7th of March; and on the 10th of July it was abandoned. I have referred to the efforts that were made by another right hon. Gentleman to amend the poor law; I have noticed the two attempts that he made with that object; but I did scant justice to the legislative enterprise of that right hon. Gentleman, for I find that, besides these great efforts, he also introduced a Bill on no less difficult a subject than pauper removal. That Bill was introduced on the 1st of April; and on the 27th of June it was abandoned. There was a Bill of Her Majesty's Government that aimed at dealing with a difficulty which many Administrations have had to encounter—namely, the claims of the coal-whippers of London. A Bill to settle that difficulty was introduced on the 28th of April; and on the 4th of July it was abandoned. I must here shed a tear over the fate of a Bill which was to settle the site of the National Gallery. It was introduced on the 5th of June; and on the 12th of the same month it met a fate which I deplore. It was not abandoned, but it encountered a fate which did not permit us to hear more of it this Session. There was a Bill introduced with respect to the Dulwich charity, which demanded legislation. It was introduced on the 17th of July; and on the 21st it was abandoned. The Queen's Colleges in Ireland also engaged the attention of Her Majesty's Government. A Bill was introduced upon that subject on the 15th of July; and that Bill, too, was abandoned. The state of education in Scotland had also long occupied the attention of the Government, and upon that subject a Bill was introduced this year, which everybody thought, from the spirit of the Lord Advocate, and the uncompromising tone which seemed to animate his interesting rhetoric, was sure to be persevered in. But, no;—I find that after having been introduced on the 9th of April, it was abandoned on the 27th of June. There is another Bill, scarcely second even to these in importance, and that is the Bill on agricultural statistics. That Bill met with the same melancholy fate as the others. It came to this House from the House of Lords; it was never brought to a division, but it was abandoned.

Now, Sir, I ask any Gentlemen in this House—I care not where they sit—whether they are votaries of Conservative progress, as we are, or whether they are advocates of Liberal movement, as hon. Gentlemen opposite are or ought to be—I ask any Gentleman is this a satisfactory state of affairs?—I ask those Gentlemen who habitually attend the House, and take the greatest part in its discussions, whether, before I placed this clear and accurate statement before them, they themselves were aware of the extent and importance of the legislative failures which have taken place this Session? I have already admitted that Her Majesty's Government succeeded in passing the Bills included in the first group of measures to which I referred at the commencement of my observations; and I have now to acknowledge that they have passed two other measures. One of these is the Bill for the retirement of the two Bishops. Now, I can only say myself that I regret that that measure did not deal with the whole question, and that it has therefore settled nothing. It is really not a measure to settle the question of the retirement of Bishops; it is a private and personal arrangement; it only provides for the retirement of two Prelates; and, although the question is one which opens considerations of the highest interest, the measure we have passed cannot be regarded as an Act of a public and general character. The other measure passed by the Government is the County Police Bill; and an excellent measure, in my opinion, it will prove. I do not wish to depreciate the merits of Her Majesty's Government in passing that Bill, when I remind them that the subject to which it relates had long engaged the attention of Parliament, and that a well-matured measure for its settlement had been introduced by the Government of Lord Aberdeen, the noble Lord himself, as Secretary for the Home Office, representing that Government upon the occasion; I only make that observation for the purpose of reminding the House that, although that measure was an important one, the House was prepared for its enactment; and that the discussion of it did not greatly occupy their time.

I think, Sir, that under these circumstances we cannot be surprised at the great dissatisfaction and discontent that have suddenly arisen—more out of doors, I believe, than here, and therefore all the more dangerous—the great dissatisfaction and discontent that have been created by the mode in which public business has been conducted this Session. I believe—I am ready frankly to admit it—I believe that at first the House and the country were perfectly prepared to view the position of the Government with the utmost indulgence as regarded legislation. A Ministry that had terminated a war, and that was engaged for a considerable time during the sittings of Parliament in protracted negotiations for peace, was in a position to appeal to the forbearance, the indulgence, and the confidence of Parliament; and if they had said—"We are engaged in these great affairs, and therefore you must not expect from us that we should attempt to deal with any of those questions which must ultimately be settled by legislation,"—no one, I believe, would have murmured either here or in the country. But I say that it is not now in the power of the Government to urge that plea. Her Majesty's Ministers, having duly considered their position, and having greater opportunities of accurately ascertaining the real nature of that position than we who are not connected with them could possess, resolved to draw the attentive consideration of Parliament to a variety of the most important subjects that could engage the attention of a Legislature. They have held out to the country great expectations, and they cannot now be surprised that the country feels disappointed. But if this were a mere question of transient disappointment, I should not have an observation to make upon it. I cannot, however, help thinking that the time has come when the House would do well calmly to consider what is the cause of a state of affairs which we all must regret—which is most mortifying to us as a legislative assembly, and which, I think, cannot be very satisfactory to Her Majesty's Ministers. It is in order to ascertain that cause, and not, as I have already said, to frame a Bill of indictment against the Ministry, that I want to engage the attention and consideration of the House this evening, trusting that in the course of the discussion suggestions may be thrown out which must fall on the public mind, and ultimately lead to some remedial agency for this evil state of affairs. Now, Sir, it cannot be said that this unfortunate result has been occasioned by the forms of the House. I do not think there is anybody now

—not even the younger Member for Lambeth (Mr. Wilkinson)—who will get up and say that the forms of the House are its real cause. Hon. Gentlemen who have studied the forms of the House must be aware that since the year 1848 down to the present time, those forms have undergone a gradual but prudent curtailment; so much so that those who have considered well that subject, and who know how much wisdom and experience are embalmed in the forms of the House, rather apprehend that there has been of late years too great a diminution of the checks which they afford against precipitate legislation, than believe that we can facilitate the conduct of public business by the reduction of their number. Nor do I think there is anybody who will pretend for a moment that protracted debates or long speeches have brought about this result, because since I have had the honour of a seat in Parliament I never remember a Session which has been more remarkable for the absence of prolonged debates, or in which those Members who are in the habit of addressing us at that length to which they are entitled by their eloquence, their knowledge, their experience, and their position in this House, have trespassed so little on our attention. It is not the forms of the House, it is not the freedom and amplitude of our discussions, then, that have occasioned this lamentable state of affairs. To what cause is it then to be ascribed? I will state what I believe to have been the cause of it, and I beg the noble Lord and his colleagues not to suppose that in stating it I mean anything in any way personal to themselves. Quite the reverse. I believe the cause of this failure in legislation is mainly, if not entirely, to be attributed to the fact that the noble Lord and the hon. Gentlemen who now form the Ministry cannot command a Parliamentary majority. In the general conduct of affairs the greatest respect is paid to Gentlemen who occupy their position—a position which they obtained, in my opinion with all honour, and in a manner which, as far as the noble Lord is concerned, does, I think, the utmost credit to his spirit and promptitude. I say that the greatest respect is paid to Gentlemen who occupy that position; and I believe there is great willingness on the part of the House to fulfil its functions as to Supply. All the money which is required for the public service is cheerfully granted to the noble Lord when we are at war—if troops are wanted they are at once given to him; and when he is engaged in negotiations, and requires forbearance, that forbearance is yielded with equal readiness. Whether he prosecutes a war or makes a treaty he can count on the support of the House. But when Her Majesty's Ministers, turning to the functions of a Minister in a legislative assembly submit measures to the consideration of Parliament, they do not meet with that confiding support which can only exist in this House, when it is founded on traditional connection or identity of principle. The noble Lord and his colleagues are, therefore, never sure that their measures will succeed; and there are two consequences that result from this circumstance of the most injurious character. The first is—and it is a great evil—that the Queen's Ministers should deem legislation necessary on subjects of paramount importance, and yet should not be able to succeed in legislating thereon. But there is another evil inevitably consequent upon this, and to which I attribute a considerable share of the present disaster. The moment a Government is habituated to defeat, the moment they find the chances are that the measures which they propose will not succeed, those measures cease to be prepared with that scrupulous exactitude, that fineness, that finish, and that completeness of detail, which characterise the measures of a Government that feel, on introducing a Bill to Parliament, all the responsibility of successful legislation; and thus it happens that a Ministry is tempted to obtain popularity for a moment, and to make for themselves some transient reputation—if you can call it reputation—by dealing with a variety of subjects, so that the country may say "Here's a Government of men of business; these are the men we want. They are going to construct a high court of appeal; questions that have remained unsolved for 300 years are now about to receive a solution from these practical men; the law of divorce is to be reformed; the law of matrimony is to be improved; the law of partnership is to be adapted to the requirements of an enlightened age and a commercial country; and other great subjects on which the thought of the nation has long been collected are at last to be settled by men who, regardless of party considerations, are determined to show what can be done by people who are animated only by a desire to pass wise and useful measures." When Parliament met it was announced on high, although anonymous, authority, that a new era had arrived in the history of the English Parliament; that the mere struggle for power and place was to cease, and that instead of it we were to have a body of Ministers who were essentially practical men of business—who were to deal with all the difficult questions that had baffled all preceding Governments. We were told that the maxim, “measures not men,” was, for the future, to form the principle of our political life; and very shortly after that we had an illustration of the new system in the introduction of the Partnership Bill of the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Board of Trade. But, Sir, what did all this end in? Why, after six months of idle phantoms and of empty noise, it is no longer “measures not men,” but it is men without measures.

Now, if it be true—and I cannot think that when the matter is pondered over many will doubt that it is true—if it be true that this unfortunate state of affairs arises from the fact of our having a Government who are unable to command a Parliamentary majority, what is the remedy which is before us? I know I shall here be met by an objection which is heard, not, perhaps, in this House so much, but which is heard in every part of the country, in the saloon, and in the market-place alike, “this is all the consequence of the Reform Bill.” [“Hear, hear!”] One of my hon. Friends near me says “Hear, hear!” and that shows how popular and how plausible is that idea. But is the Reform Bill the real cause of this state of affairs? Because, when there is a great difficulty there are always many specious explanations afloat, and the question is, although they be specious, are they true? During the last twenty-four years the Reform Bill has been in operation; and during more than a moiety of that time—for a period of at least fourteen years out of the twenty-four—you have had the affairs of this country carried on by Ministries of almost every shade of opinion, who have commanded large and compact majorities. Lord Grey, who represented the high Whigs, had not only a large and commanding majority, but he had a majority of which the only fault was that it was too large. Lord Melbourne, who represented what was called Whig-Radicalism, but what in more courteous phraseology we may now call Liberalism—Lord Melbourne for five years carried on the Government of the country with a sufficient majority, even in a Parliament which had been called together by his political opponents. Certainly, the last two years of the six or seven over which the administration of Lord Melbourne extended were not distinguished by the same amount of Parliamentary support, but that circumstance was not to be attributed to the House of Commons; it was to be attributed to a fact which I am sure the Friends of Lord Melbourne have lived long enough to regret—the fact, namely, that he clung too long to office. On his retirement from power Sir Robert Peel appealed to the country as a Conservative Minister, and Sir Robert Peel obtained an ample majority to enable him to carry on successfully the government of the country. It does not appear, therefore, that there is any truth in the popular statement that the Reform Bill is the root of all this evil.

But it is said that this state of things may be attributed to the fact that parties are broken up. It is a favourite topic to talk of the “dislocation” of parties. Party, they say, no longer exists, because there are no longer distinctive principles among public men. That I believe is also a very current opinion. But is it true? It would be well for us to consider, for the interest of the country and for our own honour, whether the fact is so. I will not venture to make any observations upon hon. Gentlemen who are Members of this House. It is my happiness to think that I have personal friends on both sides of it, and indeed, in my opinion, the question is one too great to depend upon the opinions of individual Members either on the one side or the other. If I look to the country—if I look to society in its real sense—I mean to the society of all classes in this country—I do not find that parties are extinct—I do not find, when I listen to men of influence and mark among those classes of the community that take an active part in public affairs, that distinctive principles have ceased. I find that there exist two great classes of opinion, which are fairly represented—not that I think the epithets originally were either very happy or very precise, but which have passed into universal and popular acceptance—by the terms Conservative and Liberal. I hold, Sir, that those are two classes of opinions which are perfectly distinct, and in most instances are entirely opposed the one to the other. I will, with the permission of the House, proceed briefly, by way of illustrating my meaning. to advert to some points in which I think that distinction is particularly manifest. I wish to speak of both these classes, I assure hon. Members, with the greatest respect. They are both represented in this country by numerous bodies of men, each opinion is supported by numbers, by intelligence, by property, and by respectability in every sense in which that word can be used. But their dissimilarity is perfectly perceptible. For example, I hold that a Conservative principle which regards the Parliamentary settlement of 1832 as a satisfactory settlement. I hold that to be a Conservative principle which, without blind or bigoted adherence to the doctrine on all possible occasions, believes that tampering with the suffrage is a great evil to the State. I believe I am right in saying that it is a Conservative principle which holds that the due influence of property in the exercise of the suffrage is a salutary influence. I think it is a Conservative principle that in any representative scheme the influence of landed property should be sensibly felt. I hold it to be a Conservative principle that we maintain the union between Church and State—that we should not only maintain, but expand, the ecclesiastical institutions of this country. I hold it to be a Conservative principle that the estate of the Church should be respected, and that the Church itself should not be a stipendiary of the civil power. I hold it to be a Conservative principle that we maintain the Church in Ireland, believing that maintenance perfectly reconcilable with the rights and privileges of all classes of Her Majesty's subjects in that kingdom. I hold it to be a Conservative principle to cherish and protect all traditionary influences, because they are opposed to a crude centralisation, and because they are the source of an authority at once beneficent and economical. I hold it to be a Conservative principle that would respect existing corporations (ironical cheering). Sir, those ironical cheers from the hon. Gentlemen opposite convince me that I am right in this estimate, and that there is a body in this country which, though I scarcely had expected it, is even represented in this House, and which holds opinions exactly the reverse of those which I have stated. [Cheers from the Ministerial Benches.] Those cheers from the Ministerial benches show that there is in this country, and even in this House, a body who believe that the Parliamentary settlement of 1832 ought not to be maintained—that it arrests the progress of the movement they desire to see; a body who believe that the influence of property on the exercise of the suffrage, which we regard as wholesome, ought to be prevented; a body who, instead of cherishing and encouraging, hold the influence of landed property in the representation of the country to be an influence which ought not to be encouraged, but rather to be checked. I have no fear of misrepresenting the opinions of hon. Gentlemen opposite when I say that there are those among them who look at least with suspicion upon the union between Church and State, and who, if they bow to it, bow to it only because it is established; who are not in favour of expanding—indeed, scarcely of maintaining—our ecclesiastical institutions; who would willingly see the Church a stipendiary of the civil power; who are opposed to traditionary influences [“Hear!”], who, as the cheer of the hon. Gentleman assures us, would rather, instead of a free magistracy, have a magistracy framed upon what they consider more precise principles, but in my opinion, principles not so favourable as the present to the preservation of the public liberties of the country. I do not find fault with hon. Gentlemen for entertaining such opinions; I am trying to state them fairly; but their assent to my exposition proves that I am right in my assumption, that in this country there are two great parties, each representing distinctive principles. If I go to another great branch of public life—if I touch on the subjects which a few years ago did not attract much notice, but which at the present absorb the attention of Parliament, to the injury, perhaps, of many of those measures of internal improvement to which the Queen invited our attention in Her most gracious Speech from the Throne—I mean foreign affairs—I find in the country—I am not speaking of this House, for far be it from me to be personal to any hon. Gentleman—that there are opinions on all the great questions of foreign politics perfectly opposed to each other. Nor is this an unimportant consideration, for, let me remind the House, it is upon the prevalence of one or other of these two classes of opinion, the whole form and aspect of the history of this country may be said to depend. I have always considered, in respect to foreign affairs, that there were three great questions upon which it becomes any man who aspires to be a statesman in this country, as well as of any Parliamentary party which incurs the responsibility of supporting particular individuals, to have clear and precise ideas. These three subjects are—the Russian empire, the Austrian empire, and our relations with the United States of America. There is no doubt a class of persons in this country who have always looked with great jealousy upon the expansion and the policy of the Russian empire; and when we went to war with Russia the object of that party—the avowed object, which they upheld with energy, eloquence, and earnestness—was the necessity of dismembering the Russian empire. For my own part I have always been of opinion that the dismembering of the Russian empire is not an object which any statesman ought to propose to himself; that the dismemberment of the Russian empire could not be attained—even if we were successful in attaining it at all—without one of those long wars which might fatally exhaust the energies and lower the character of this country in the scale of nations; and even if the dismemberment took place, we should find that the ultimate result would be, that the balance of power in Europe would be distributed in a manner prejudicial to our interests. That I take to be the Conservative view upon this question, as opposed to the views of the other section. I apprehend that there are in this country two distinct opinions, each supported by powerful parties, on this question of foreign policy. Take, again, the case of the Austrian empire. I hold that it is the Conservative opinion that the maintenance of the Austrian empire is necessary to the independence, and, if necessary to the independence, necessary to the civilisation and even to the liberties of Europe. Sir, there is a contrary opinion to that. A great party in this country is of opinion, that from the dismemberment of the Austrian empire very great political advantages might be obtained, not for this country only, but for the whole civilised world. I would now bring you to a question which has recently been engaging our attention—to Italy. Just as the dismemberment of the Russian empire involves the question of the restoration of Poland and Finland, so the dismemberment of the Austrian empire involves the question of the independence of Hungary and the emancipation of Italy. Are we to be told, that upon these subjects there are no different opinions in this country? Is there a single Gentleman here who is not conscious that even tomorrow he may be called upon to vote upon these questions, questions upon which the whole policy of the country depends? I hold it to be a Conservative principle to believe that, if we or any other Power should forcibly interfere in the affairs of Italy with the view of changing the political settlement of that country, the result will be, as in the case of an attempt to dismember Russia, one of those protracted wars that might fatally exhaust this country, and which, even supposing it to be successful, would leave Italy, very possibly not in the possession of Austria, but under the dominion of some other Power as little national. Let us look next to our relations with the United States. What is your policy with respect to that country? There are those who view with the utmost jealousy and regard in a litigious spirit, the progress of the United States of America—who think that any advance in their power, or any expansion of their territory, is opposed to the commercial interest, and perhaps also to the political influence of England. But I am not of that opinion—I am of a contrary opinion—[“Hear!”]—I apprehend, then, that with respect to these three subjects of foreign policy, on any one of which we may at any time be called upon to act, there are distinctive opinions: and, therefore, it is idle to pretend that parties have ceased to exist, because on all political subjects, men are now united in their sentiments. While nothing can be more monstrous than attempts on the part of the people of the United States to attack the possessions of civilised Powers—attempts, for example, to appropriate Canada or Cuba—while such violations of international law would, in the case of the United States, no doubt bring the same retribution and the same punishment as would visit infractions of public law by any other country, yet, I cannot forget that the United States, though independent, are still, in some sense, colonies, and are influenced by colonial tendencies; and, when they come in contact with large portions of territory scarcely populated, or, at the most, sparsely occupied by an indolent and unintelligent race of men, it is impossible—and you, yourselves, find it impossible—to resist the tendency to expansion; and expansion, in that sense, is not injurious to England, for it contributes to the wealth of this country—(let me say this in a whisper, lest it cross the Atlantic)—more than that—it diminishes the power of the United States. In our foreign relations with the United States, therefore, I am opposed to that litigious spirit of jealousy which looks upon the expansion of that country and the advance of these young communities with an eye of jealousy and distrust. When I am told that parties are broken up, I reply that the Conservative party in this country retains the opinions that it always professed, and is prepared to stand by those opinions. I take it for granted that those who profess contrary opinions are equally in earnest and equally ready to assert them. But, Sir, if there is such a thing as a Conservative party—if there are such persons as Conservatives in this House—I should like to know where are the Liberals, and by whom are they represented? I do not know whether Her Majesty's Government represent them; for, so far as I can form a judgment, the opinions the noble Lord has generally professed—and I take him as the chief and ablest exponent of the views of his political associates—I cannot believe that the noble Lord is not as ready as any gentleman who sits on this side of the House to approve the Parliamentary settlement of 1832. The noble Lord has frankly and explicitly told you that he does not disapprove of the just influence of property on the exercise of the franchise—that he would resist any endeavour artificially to restrict it. He is not opposed to the land having a sensible influence on our representative system. This very Session he has announced his intention to support the Irish Church establishment—he cannot therefore be supposed to be adverse to our Ecclesiastical institutions. He has never been hostile to traditional influences—he has on every occasion cherished and promoted them. The noble Lord has never joined in any attempt to pull down the free magistracy of the country; on the contrary, he has in several instances upheld them. But, Sir, I may, perhaps, be told that, although in domestic politics the noble Lord does not differ from Gentlemen on this side of the House, it is in his external politics that he is so dangerous—that he reserves all his Liberalism for foreign affairs. ["Hear, hear!" from an hon. MEMBER on the Ministerial side.] I am glad to have my statement borne out by a follower of the noble Lord. But is this true? It so happens that during the Session of Parliament the feelings of the House have been tested upon those three great cardinal points, upon which the foreign policy of the country must depend—the Russian empire—the Austrian empire—and our relations with the United States. Let me remind the House what was the popular feeling that existed this time last year in respect of the question of the Russian empire. Dismemberment of the Russian empire was then looked upon, not as a probability, but as an absolute necessity, by a great party in this country, and men high in office, some of whom I believe were colleagues of the noble Lord, sanctioned that opinion. Hon. Gentlemen in office publicly announced that no peace could be sanctioned by this country which did not restore the independence of Poland, or, at least, wrest the Crimea from the possession of the Emperor of Russia. There can be no doubt that there was a very general opinion that on the subject of the Russian empire the noble Lord entertained views of a very extreme character. It was, in fact, in reference to that very subject that I took occasion, in one of our debates, to lay down what I conceived the Conservative principles on which peace should be negotiated with that country. I maintained that the dismemberment of Russia was impossible, perhaps not desirable, but if attempted to be obtained it would lead to a war the duration of which I would not attempt to predict. I indicated on that occasion what I deemed were the wise and statesmanlike conditions—on which peace might be obtained. Those were not the views sanctioned by those who surround and follow the noble Lord; but when the hour for practice arrived—when the time came for the solution of the question, and we all looked to the noble Lord to ascertain his views with respect to the Russian empire, he appears to me to have been as Conservative in his conduct as we could have wished to see him. He agreed to a peace which recognised the integrity of the Russian empire, and the terms of the treaty were framed very much in accordance with the policy that I had sketched out. Therefore, as far as his views concerning the Russian empire form a test of his opinions, the noble Lord is as little a votary of Liberalism as he is on the wide range of questions of internal interest to which I have adverted. Then, turn to the Austrian empire. That unquestionably was a subject on which—notwithstanding our recent experience of the Conservative policy of the noble Lord in regard to Russia—the greatest hopes are entertained by the sincere supporters of Liberal principles; and the circumstances that occurred at the Conferences at Paris seemed to authorise some such expectations. But what really occurred? Till almost within a few weeks back, it was supposed that a violent interference was to take place in Italy, and the most important changes were anticipated, which would have totally altered the balance of power in Europe; still, so far as I can observe—from all that I can hear—there is no chance whatever of any such dangerous course being followed by the noble Lord; but, on the contrary, in a true Conservative spirit, he is endeavouring, in conjunction with our great Ally, to obtain those temperate changes in the condition of Italy which all desire, by the aid and influence of Austrian authority. Let us now come to the third case which I put. Can any one doubt that many persons believed—and for that belief, perhaps, there were more colourable causes than in the other instances—that the noble Lord would never be content with less than a war with the United States. We were told that he was prone to resent an injury or an insult without so much as asking or waiting for explanations—that no explanations would be satisfactory—that he was resolved on picking a quarrel, and a quarrel he would have. What has really occurred during the present Session of Parliament? That which seems to me a lamentable circumstance, if not a very great insult to the Government of this country. I may be permitted to say that when Mr. Crampton received his letters of dismissal from the President of the United States, I from the first endeavoured, as far as I had any influence, to discourage any discussion with respect to our relations with the United States on the narrow issue of the enlistment quarrel, and desired that when the discussion did take place it should embrace the principles on which our policy towards that country should be founded;—for I was certain that if that discussion took place, in time the people of this country would have adopted a tone which would relieve the American mind from the only cause which, as I believe, keeps alive feelings of suspicion and jealousy against this country—namely, the mode in which they were dealing with the question of the appropriation of territory. But how did the noble Lord behave when the Minister of the Queen was—I may say—expelled from the United States? It was expected by every one who had investigated the affair that this country would be involved, if not in a war, at least in a bitter and protracted controversy. But, on the contrary, the mild dignity of Conservatism was never more effectually represented than it was on that occasion by the noble Lord. How then, after our recent experience, can any one regard the noble Lord as the firebrand which he was for some time assumed by the world to be? Well, Sir, under the circumstances I cannot but think that the Government of which the noble Lord is the head, is Conservative. Whether I look to subjects of internal interest or the conduct which it has pursued with respect to the high questions of foreign policy, I do not see that Her Majesty's Government, in pursuing the course they did, were pursuing any other than a course in harmony with Conservative principles and Conservative practice. But because Her Majesty's Government have pursued such a course, are we justified in saying that parties are broken up? It may be very convenient to some persons to promulgate such a theory. It may be very convenient to some that such rumours should be believed; but I protest against their authenticity. I apprehend that there is a Conservative party and a Conservative policy, and if the noble Lord and his Colleagues are pursuing that policy, the inference is erroneous that the Conservative party is extinct. What party is really extinct it is not for me now to say. I would rather leave that question to the inference and the critical conclusion of the House and the country. I know it may be said that it would be more straightforward, and more in accordance with the genius of the people of this country, that the Conservative policy should be carried out by those who are avowedly Conservatives; but what I say is, that we who maintain Conservative opinions—and I do not think the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield will again term us fancifully "what remains of the Conservative party in this country"—and who deplore the consequences of a Parliamentary Session like that now closing—that we have two sources of consolation in the present state of affairs. In the first place we have, what I think should be, and what I have no doubt will be, the greatest consolation to us—to see our opinions prevalent in high places. The second, which is scarcely less important, is, that the inevitable consequence of the existing system will be an injurious influence upon the position of our rivals, the Liberal party. No party can long exist where its chief and selected men are in power, and continue to hold office, not only without carrying their principles into effect, but without even frankly avowing their profession. I see before me many Members of the Administration who obtained their seats in this House by their protestations to their constituents—by their Liberal engagements to the great Liberal party—but who, having adopted a Conservative policy, still retain their seats in that Administration. It is for them to explain their position to their constituents, and to the party in the country whom they are supposed to represent. But I would say to the Conservative party, do not lose heart; if this system continues, the Liberal party will be thrown back fifty years; nothing can long resist the deleterious influence of the position in which they are now placed with reference to the possession of power. We have then these two sources of consolation; and the people of this country will, upon reflection, soon discover what is the reason that measures of great public necessity are not passed in this House, though they are proposed by a Minister. They will find, upon reflection, that from the competitive emulation of great political parties has sprung that wise and temperate system of Government which has so long characterised the history of this country; they will cherish with still greater interest, and they will value still more highly, the distinctive principles which form parties. At any rate, when we are told—as we have been told for the last six months—that the present lamentable state of public affairs is occasioned by the break-up of parties, we, at least, can say, “That allegation does not apply to us; we are a Conservative party; we hold Conservative opinions; we are prepared to maintain them; and if a Minister who has no opinions cannot pass his measures, he has no right—and those who defend him have no right—to libel the constitution of the country, to which we owe all our reputation and our greatness.” Sir, I now move for—

“A Return of the number of Public Bills, and their Titles, the Orders for which, in any of their stages, have been discharged during the present Session, and the date of the discharge of each of such Orders.”

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, the right hon. Gentleman, in reviewing the proceedings of the Session, has, in the latter part of his speech, gone somewhat far a-field. Diverging from questions relating to Parliamentary business, he has called attention to the constitutional division of parties in this country, and has touched upon subjects which affect the general interests, not only of Europe, but of the civilised world. While listening to those observations of the right hon. Gentleman which related to the political tenets of the Conservative party, I was led for a while to admire, with internal thankfulness, the generosity—unequalled in this country—of a political opponent who was inculcating upon those who are considered to be his followers the doctrine, that there was nothing in the opinions or conduct of Her Majesty's Government which should prevent them from giving to that Government their entire support. I was looking forward with hopeful expectation to the manner in which in the next Session of Parliament we should all go out into the same lobby—if, indeed, there could be found any man who would give us an opportunity of doing so by a Motion adverse to the Government or involving its existence. But, Sir, I was soon disabused. These brilliant prospects were soon converted into darker hues, and the feeling of overflowing gratitude gave place to sentiments not quite so friendly. The right hon. Gentleman, feeling perhaps confidence in the attachment of his own supporters, knowing that the incitements he was holding out to desertion would be without effect, and that he was acting with perfect security in apparently desiring to transfer to us that allegiance which hitherto has been devoted to him, proceeded to adopt what I must say was a somewhat treacherous course, by endeavouring to sow disunion in the ranks of those who sit on this side of the House. Sir, I am not afraid of the result of these endeavours. I feel as confident that that part of his speech will not produce schism on this side as I presume he felt confident that his apparent inducement to desertion would not, on any future occasion, thin the ranks upon which he relies. So much, then, for that part of the right hon. Gentleman's speech which related to internal affairs, upon which, however, I will just add one word. While in the end he reproached Her Majesty's Government for abandoning liberal views, in the earlier part of his speech he made it, as it were, an accusation against the Government, that they had devoted all their attention to disturbing the internal interests of the country, and had inundated the House with more measures of improvement than it was possible to pass in the course of the Session. With regard to the right hon. Gentleman's profession of faith as to foreign affairs, no man will dispute the accuracy of his statement that our relations with Russia, with Austria, and with the United States of America are cardinal points upon which the foreign policy of this country must turn. I will not discuss with the right hon. Gentleman the practical application of his own peculiar views with regard to those three great Powers; but I must say that when, as the leader of a great party, the right hon. Gentleman takes the opportunity of explaining—from what our cousins on the other side of the Atlantic would call a "political platform"—not merely to those who happen to listen to him, but through this House to the country, the principles upon which the political policy of himself and his party is in future to be founded, I must say I think his omissions are more remarkable than his statements. It is somewhat singular—somewhat surprising—especially after the events of the last two or three years, that the right hon. Gentleman should have had nothing to say with regard to our relations with France. What we are to infer from the silence of the right hon. Gentleman on that point I cannot tell; but one may say of it that which was said of the statue of Brutus, that its absence was more striking than the presence of the others. Certainly Her Majesty's present Government have not made so imperfect a catalogue of the cardinal points of the foreign relations of this country. Of their catalogue France forms a most essential part. These, however, are the mere ornamental parts of the right hon. Gentleman's speech. I shall now turn to the more practical portion of it. I do not rise, Sir, for the purpose of carrying on a party controversy with the right hon. Gentleman. I do not, in the first place, admit the correctness of the opinion which he has expressed, that the public mind of this country is impressed with notions adverse to the efficiency of this House; and, without meaning to apply to the right hon. Gentleman any charge of want of sympathy with the House, I must say I do not think it is for one of its Members to endeavour to run down the House in the estimation of the country. I shall not be tempted by the opportunity which some parts of the right hon. Gentleman's speech afford for entering upon political controversy, but shall rather endeavour, in a very few words, to vindicate the authority and character of this House. The great charge which the right hon. Gentleman has made is that a large number of measures relating to important matters, and the merit of which he did not dispute, which we have introduced to Parliament have failed; and he has inquired what was the cause. I might, if I were disposed to argue the question in that way, speak of it as a question of internal dissension in this House—"Si causam quaris circumspecte." If we ask the cause why so many of these measures have failed, I might answer that it was on account of the obstruction they met with from hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House. ["No, no!"] At all events they failed from the resistance which they met in this House. But I do not state that in accusation of those whose obstruction has been the cause of the failure; I do not state this with the view of reproaching them for their conduct, because, for reasons I have to state, I do not think there is any just cause of complaint that good measures have been obstructed. If we were in an arbitrary country—if this were a country in which the sovereign power had nothing to do but to call round it men conversant with the different matters on which it might be necessary that new laws should be framed—if we had nothing to do but to collect the cumulative wisdom of different persons learned in the matters on which we wished to legislate, and having framed laws in accordance with their views, at once to issue them on authority, and cause them to be carried into effect—then, of course, measures would not be brought forward one day to be withdrawn the next, or abandoned after long and earnest discussion. But we must recollect that such is not the constitution of this country, and much it is to our advantage that it is not so. When, however, we are enjoying great advantages from our constitutional organisation, we must take the rough and the smooth, the good and the bad together, and must not repine at defects which are inherent in our system, from which, on the whole, we realise such great and incalculable advantages. The Government finds, on looking round, that in certain departments of the State, in particular portions of the administrative system, affecting, perhaps, our commerce, our agriculture, and other interests, abuses and inconveniences have arisen, requiring practical remedies to be applied. The Government does its part; it devises measures calculated, as it thinks, to accomplish the ends in view, and submits those measures to Parliament; and when they come into this House no one supposes that their success or failure is to depend entirely upon their merit or demerit. Why, measures of great importance—measures calculated to produce important reforms in particular branches of the system into which abuses have crept, must necessarily meet with great resistance, partly from prejudice, partly from want of information, and partly from interested motives; because in all abuses there must be a certain number of men who profit by them, and who in our representative system are enabled to bring their resistance to bear upon this House. Therefore it is no reflection on a measure that it is opposed—it is no proof that it is not a good one, that it is not well constructed, or is not well adapted to its purpose, that when it comes into Parliament it should meet, in the first instance at least, with such resistance as to cause its failure. Well, such has been the case, undoubtedly, with regard to many of those measures to which the right hon. Gentleman has adverted. I repeat, I do not state that as a reproach to those by whose obstruction these measures have failed. Failure, at first, is an unavoidable incident to free discussion, of freedom of opinion, and of the intercourse of Members of Parliament with persons out of the House, whose organs they must necessarily be, and whose organs, if they were not, we should not—in this House, at least—see the opinions of the community properly represented. Any man who expects to see great improvements in any part of our system accomplished off-hand—to see every first attempt successful, and everything that is required done in one Session—will be lamentably disappointed. It never has been so; it never will be so; it never can be so. It is a necessary result of our free constitution that the best measures cannot be carried until a considerable length of time has elapsed, until they have been well discussed, and are well understood in the country, until prejudices have been overcome, until interests have been silenced, and until the great majority of the country has become convinced, not only of the existence of the abuse, but also of the goodness of the remedies which it is proposed to apply. If any man looks back to the different improvements which have been made at any past period in the legislation of this country, he will, I think, perceive that such has been the usual course of events. And, Sir, though such slowness of progress is mortifying to those who bring in such measures, knowing that they are good ones—though it is disappointing to that portion of the community out of doors, who are anxiously looking for the improvements aimed at, and although, more especially, it exposes this House to censure from those ardent spirits who, not happening to be here, think that if they were here they should, by their energy, their ability, and their eloquence, overcome all resistance, and carry their views into practice, though these disappointments and mortifications occur, yet, perhaps, on the whole, this delay is not to the disadvantage of the country, because measures of improvement, however good in themselves, might fail to produce the utmost benefit which they are adapted to secure, if they were carried too hastily, before the public mind had been fairly brought into accordance with them, and before ample discussion had afforded the means of sifting them thoroughly, of removing anything in them which might be defective, and of bringing them, as far as possible, into harmony with the state of things with which they were to be connected. I say, then, Sir, that although we must regret that many of those measures which we felt it our duty to introduce in the course of this Session have not passed into law, it must be remembered that a year or a Session is but a moment in the history of a people. It is indeed a long period in the minds of ardent and ambitious men, but it is not long in the progress of a country; and the country need not suppose that, because good measures have not been passed at once, measures of the same kind will not in some future Session become law. Sir, there has certainly been no want of application or of devotion to public duties on the part of Members of this House. There never was a Session in which during the same number of days the House devoted a greater number of hours—day by day and night by night—to the public service than in the Session which is now about to close. The days on which the House has adjourned before midnight during the present Session are few in number. Indeed, during the greater portion of the Session we have been sitting till a late hour of the morning. My hon. Friend the Member for Salford (Mr. Brotherton) seems to have entirely abdicated his functions. He has nobly sacrificed his own wishes and theories to the public good. He has not interfered of late with the sitting of the House after midnight. Therefore, if measures of importance have not passed into law in the present Session of Parliament, no one can say that it is owing to any want of diligence on the part of the Members of this House. It may be said, that it has arisen from the too great loquacity of Members—that the measures in question have been discussed too much. Well, I might at first be disposed to say, that I would rather there had been less discussion; but, taking a larger view of the matter, I do not complain, and I do not think the country has a right to complain, of the length of any discussion which was bona fide intended to improve or to throw light upon the measure under consideration. Now, in so far as the Government itself is concerned, hon. Members ought to bear in mind what proportion of the time of sitting included in the Session has been at our disposal. A few days ago it appeared that the House had sat 104 days. Of these, fifty-one were Government days; the rest, were days at the disposal of private Members. Of the fifty-one days, twenty were occupied by Committees of Supply, in discussing and passing estimates which form a necessary part of the public service, and the whole of these twenty days, therefore, were necessarily abstracted from the time available for the discussion of public measures. There were, I think, only twenty-two days during the whole Session on which the Government was able to bring forward and obtain a discussion upon measures of its own. And when hon. Members consider the great diversity of opinion which necessarily prevailed upon many of the subjects which the right hon. Gentleman mentioned—when they consider the complicated interests which were involved, and the resistance which some of those interests naturally offered to our proceedings, I think they will not feel that on those two-and-twenty days we were inattentive to our duty, or that more might easily have been accomplished. Moreover, Sir, three of those days were given—I need not remind hon. Members that it is not unusual for Members to ask the Government, in Parliamentary phraseology, “to give them a day”—three of those days, I say, were given to independent Members, Motions hostile to the Government; three other days were taken by Members hostile to the Government, without our leave being asked, on the Motion for going into Committee of Supply. There were a few other days which were unavailable for any purpose of real business; and, as I said before, the whole amount of time during the whole course of the Session which the Government had at their disposal for their own measures, was two-and-twenty days. Now, Sir, as I have said, I do not reproach hon. Gentlemen opposite for having, from a sense of duty, obstructed measures which we thought, if passed, would have been of great advantage to the country. We trust that those measures may succeed in a future Session. Indeed, when measures of great importance are produced, which involve a conflict of interests and alterations of systems long established, I do not know that there is any disadvantage in allowing them to stand over for a time, in order that they may be well considered by the country, and that in the recess they may have directed to them the studied attention of those who are competent to understand and appreciate them in all their details. I am not even sure, if we had had our choice in regard to some of the measures to which the right hon. Gentleman has adverted, that it would not, upon full consideration, have been the better course to subject them to more mature deliberation, and reproduce them for discussion in another Session. Well, Sir, I do not stand here simply on behalf of the Government against an Opposition. An Opposition is so called, because it is its function to oppose. We do not complain of opposition to the Government, especially when it is founded upon a real conviction, derived from constituencies or large bodies of men out of doors, that the measures proposed are either bad in their nature, overstrained in their enactments, or difficult in their provisions. I do not complain of that; but standing here—if I may without presumption undertake a duty which the right hon. Gentleman has cast upon me—to defend the House of Commons, I say that, in my opinion, there is nothing in any of the statements which the right hon. Gentleman has made that ought in the slightest degree to weaken the confidence which the country has felt, and, I maintain, does feel, in this House as a branch of the Legislature. Sir, it is not unnatural that those who sit on the opposite side of the House should take advantage of the end of a Session to recount what they term the "failures" of the Government; but, I must say, Sir, that we bear with great calmness and fortitude those partial disappointments and inconveniences to which the right hon. Gentleman has alluded, because we look with some pride and satisfaction at the victories which we have achieved upon the few occasions on which we have been called to do battle upon any great field of action. We recollect—the country will recollect—that, although good measures have been defeated by determined opponents after midnight, although the pertinacious resistance of hon. Gentlemen ensconced on the heights of the Opposition benches may, in a few instances, have been successful, and although we may have sustained some checks by having our Bills refused to be taken into consideration after such and such an hour, yet we know that, whatever may have been our mortifications and "failures" of that nature, yet upon the five or six occasions on which there have been found Gentlemen who have fairly given us a challenge to deadly combat, to fight à l'outrance, we have had majorities such as it has been the lot of few Governments to enjoy. We remember that our majorities have grown from 100 and 104 to, I believe, the unprecedented number of 194; and therefore, looking to these great achievements, which will not easily be effaced from the memory of the country, we think that during the recess we may console ourselves with the reflection that, in spite of those partial inconveniences to which the right hon. Gentleman had referred, we have had proofs unmistakeable that we enjoy the confidence of the House of Commons. There is no denying, there is no gainsaying the record of divisions upon votes of censure. We have had the satisfaction of seeing that, when Motions have been made, the avowed and clear object of which was to take from those who now are charged with the conduct of affairs the power which they wield, the sense of this House was expressed decidedly against such Motions. I would humbly trust that our future conduct in the offices which we hold will not belie the good faith and goodwill which the past has evidenced, and that when we meet again next year we shall not find that anything has happened in the recess calculated in any way to weaken the confidence in us which large majorities of this House have been kind enough to express. Sir, it is true that there are many measures of great importance which we have not been able to carry. It is also true that we began this Session having on our hands the conduct of a great and an arduous war. It is true that our attention was directed to the vigorous prosecution of that war. It is true that soon after the Session began, we had thrown upon us the difficult and delicate task of conducting negotiations for peace—negotiations to be carried on in concert with Allies, in which our own opinions were not to be our only guide, and in which, therefore, great delicacy of management was required. It is further true, that we succeeded in bringing these negotiations to a satisfactory termination. Therefore, Sir, while, on the one hand, the right hon. Gentleman has done us but justice in recounting all those various and important questions to which the different Members of the Government had succeeded in giving their attention in spite of many distracting cares, while he has done us the simple justice of acknowledging that no Government, in the most peaceful and tranquil times, ever more successfully devoted their attention to measures of a great range and scope of internal improvement, and which—though for the reasons I have mentioned failed to pass—prove, at all events, the sedulous and unremitting attention of the different Members of the Government to the business of their respective departments—on the other hand, we may boast of having brought a vast and important European transaction to a good and satisfactory settlement. Sir, I trust that nothing I have said will bear, any more than the speech of the right hon. Gentleman bears, the aspect of party acrimony as between different sides of this House. I do justice to the motives which led him to make his statement; but, at the same time, I think there was nothing in that statement—I trust I have shown there was not—which ought in any degree to lower the character of this House in the opinion of the country, or to induce the nation to think less highly than it hitherto has done of our powers and functions as a deliberative and legislative assembly.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, he would not presume to detain the House by entering into the discussion which had been going on for some time with regard to the respective merits of what were called Conservatives and Liberals. He was one of those who had but a hazy perception of what constituted the exact difference between them. He found individuals on the other side entertaining Liberal views upon particular questions, and, on the other hand, he found gentlemen on the Ministerial benches entertaining what he called Conservative views upon particular questions. It did not appear to him to be at all useful or necessary to enter into any investigation of that kind. He wished to make one or two remarks upon some of the measures to which the right hon. Gentleman had referred. The Government had failed to carry many most useful measures; and although their failure was no doubt to a certain extent caused by that obstructive spirit which always stood in the way of reforms that trenched upon vested interests and shocked prejudices, he thought also there was another thing which conduced to their failure—namely, a belief that the Government were not very much in earnest—that they would not care very much about being defeated. He found fault with the noble Lord at the head of the Government for being too ready to beat a retreat and abandon his measures on a small show of opposition. That was what the noble Lord had done with reference to the Bill which dealt with the local charges on shipping. The Lancashire district regarded that measure as one of very great importance; but no decision was ever come to by the House with respect to it, for it was never pressed to a division, but, in the midst of the debate, all in a moment, it was abandoned. They were told that the subject was to be referred to a Select Committee; but it had already been under the consideration of a Royal Commission, and had received the fullest investigation. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wells (Mr. Hayter) showed too much timidity on that occasion, for if the Government had persevered they would, he believed, have carried the second reading. The reason given for withdrawing the measure, and leaving the Vice President of the Board of Trade in the lurch, was that Gentlemen on that side of the House had not sufficiently supported the Government—that they had not made speeches in favour of the measure; but he took that opportunity positively to deny that he and those who acted with him were not anxious to give the Government all the support in their power, and the only reason why they did not express their sentiments was that the debate was suddenly brought to a conclusion, and no opportunity of doing so was afforded them. He never recollected the abandonment of a measure in the midst of a debate under similar circumstances. He hoped, however, that the Vice President of the Board of Trade would assure them that a measure on the subject would be brought forward by the Government next Session, with a resolution to carry it, if possible, through Parliament. There was another measure which he (Mr. Gibson) had himself introduced, for the repeal of the oath of abjuration, with respect to which he had some observations to make. Although the Ministers in the House of Commons supported that measure, a Cabinet Minister in another place voted against it. He was astonished that Ministers were unable to come to any understanding among themselves with regard to a measure of that description; he thought that the vote given by the Earl of Harrowby against it was a wretched vote for a member of a Liberal administration, and he hoped the noble Lord would inform his colleague that no Administration whose leading members gave such votes could claim the support of Members on that side of the House. The oath which he wished to repeal had been condemned by the House of Commons, it had been called “blasphemous” by Lord Derby, yet Members were still compelled to stand at the table and take it. He contended that no Member could take it, after the condemnation which had been passed upon it, without a sense of personal indignity. Lord Derby introduced a Bill for the purpose of dealing with the oath, but abandoned it without any apparent reason. The oath was retained only because it perpetrated an injustice on a portion of Her Majesty’s subjects, who by its means were indirectly deprived of their civil rights. He hoped the Government would make this a Cabinet question, for it was disgraceful that the City of London should for nine years have been deprived of one of its representatives, because that representative, although entitled by law to a seat in the House, was unable from conscientious motives to take an obnoxious and impious oath. The last subject upon which he had to remark was the allusion of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Disraeli) to the readiness with which, during the present Session, Parliament had granted supplies to the Crown. Now, the public, in his opinion, believed that the House had been voting money in blind profusion; that they had been utterly reckless in regard to the public expenditure, and he was afraid that recklessness was not altogether confined to the House, but was shared by a considerable portion of the people. The language of the day was, "Do not reduce your establishments; keep up both your army and your navy; recollect your want of preparation at the commencement of the last war; and that House had sanctioned an expenditure of something like £80,000,000 per annum. If such language was held in the first year of peace, what hope had they of any reduction of taxation, of a continuation of those financial reforms which were commenced by Sir Robert Peel, and were carried on until the unfortunate moment when the war began? He was glad to hear the noble Lord the Member for London say, that it was not the policy of England to be a great military Power; but he was afraid that the Government had to some extent been pandering to the notion that they ought to aspire to that character. He believed they were not more to blame in that respect than the House, but they were certainly somewhat influenced by what Lord Brougham once called a childish passion for military parade. Such parade did not suit the genius of the institutions of England, and he thought they should still rest for their main defence on their navy. It was strange, indeed, to find candidates for seats in that House recommending themselves to electors upon the ground that they would take care that the army and navy should be kept up and that a sufficient amount of money should be expended. The duty of Members of that House was to take care that our establishments were not unnecessarily large. The business of that House was primarily to take care of the purses and liberties of their constituents, and they might be sure that the Crown and the governing classes would take care of the army and navy—their (the House of Commons) great difficulty would rather be to keep those establishments down. He hoped that next Session the noble Lord Viscount Palmerston would show that he was an economist, and that he would adopt Earl Grey's motto of "Peace, retrenchment, and reform;" otherwise the noble Lord might find that this feeling in favour of large military and naval establishments in time of peace was only a feeling of the hour. It might turn out to be a hot fit, and the noble Lord might have to suffer the cold shiver which was sure to come at the general election, when hon. Members had to go before their constituents.

MR. NAPIER said, that some years ago, at his instance, a Commission was appointed to inquire into the subject of legal education. That Commission was composed of Mr. Justice Coleridge, Vice Chancellor Wood, and himself, and other Members of the legal profession. It had worked hard, had made inquiries into the state of education abroad, on the Continent; it had framed a Report which was happily unanimous. Yet since that Report was laid upon the table, nothing had been done. There was a strong feeling on this matter. People would not go and serve on Commissions if they were to be so treated. Vice Chancellor Wood and Mr. Justice Coleridge had devoted much time and attention to the inquiry. He would ask the noble Lord if before the next Session something could not be done on the subject? The Solicitor General was known to take great interest in it. At the beginning of the Session he had put a question to the Home Secretary about it. The Report had been discussed by the Bar and was generally approved of. There was another subject which he had to bring before the House—that of the creation of a department of Public Justice. It was an important subject, which had occupied much of the attention of his noble Friend Lord Brougham, who had considered that if such department was formed, it would be the means of introducing several useful reforms. The Lord Chancellor had adopted the plan of appointing some person to improvise legislation on the matter. He (Mr. Napier) did not know what the plan was, and therefore would not criticise it; but next Session he should ask the same question as he had then, whether a Bill would be laid before Parliament? He hoped that at the opening of the next Session, the difficult subject of criminal jurisprudence would be dealt with, and he thought it worthy of the attention of the Government during the recess. Before he sat down, he would refer to what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Manchester (Mr. M. Gibson) with regard to the oath of abjuration. The noble Lord the Member for the City of London had supported two distinct questions—one to modernise the oath of abjuration, and the other dealing with the Jewish question. This question was altogether distinct. There would be no difficulty in removing the objections to the oath of abjuration if no reference were made to the Jews. He would recommend his right hon. Friend if he wished to make his measure acceptable, to confine himself to the modernisation of the oath, as proposed by the noble Lord the Member for the City of London, and in that case he (Mr. Napier) would give it his support. He had brought the two matters to which he had first alluded before the House, in the expectation of an assurance from the Government that they would consider them both, and submit to the House their views on the department of Public Justice.

MR. MOWBRAY complained of the inattention which private and particular interests met with at the hands of the House. The Charity Commission had recommended a reform of Dulwich College, which the House had neglected to sanction. A Report with respect to Sherbourne Hospital was framed in June, 1855. A Bill had been brought into that House on the 1st July last, which might as well have been brought in on the 1st of February, and the consequence was, that the Bill was abandoned. He certainly could not congratulate the Charity Commission in its working, and he hoped, that next Session, the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Baines) would be prepared to bring in these schemes at the time when the Legislature could deal with them.

MR. WILKINSON observed, that there was much difference of opinion respecting the Bill for Dulwich College. One party supported it, while it was opposed by another, who wished it to be referred to a Select Committee before it passed. If the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Disraeli) had been pleased to sneer at his experience in reference to a measure which he had proposed to the House when he brought forward that measure, he hoped that he had spoken with becoming modesty of his experience. He could, if he pleased, retort on the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, which had met with no cheers from either side of the House. He had listened to that speech with pleasure, but he could not help thinking that it would have been none the worse if it had been delivered in an hour instead of two.

MR. HADFIELD congratulated the House and the Ministry on the temper, the dignity, and the forbearance they had shown during the Session. He congratulated more especially the Government on its conduct at an instant when we were at the point of war with those whom we might almost call our countrymen and our kinsmen—the citizens of the United States. So far were we from lowering our character by our dignified forbearance in that affair, that we had raised it to a point which it would not have reached in any other way. He appealed to the hon. Member for Derby (Mr. L. Heyworth), who had just returned from the United States, whether our conduct had not, in the estimation of the people of that country, raised our character to a point it never reached before. He hoped that these trifling matters, which had so nearly caused war between the two countries, would never occur again.

MR. BAINES said, he wished to say a single word as to the working of the recommendation of the Charity Commissioners. He agreed with the hon. Gentleman that the Act of Parliament relating to that Commission required considerable amendment; and if, during another Session of Parliament, he held the position which he then held, he hoped he should have the benefit of the experience of the hon. Member in amending that Act. Still, out of five cases which had been taken up by the Government, three had received the Royal Assent. Of the two which had not passed, the hon. Member for Lambeth had given satisfactory reasons for the postponement of the measure respecting Dulwich College. As to the Bill respecting Sherbourne Hospital, it had been introduced at a time when it was expected that there would be no opposition. The House was probably not aware what had happened to the Bill in the House of Lords. The Sherbourne Hospital was an eleemosynary charity. The Lords had introduced Amendments into the Bill, among which was one saddling the estate with the payment of £200 a year, and another transferring four advowsons belonging to the charity, from the trustees to the Bishop of Durham. These changes—he might almost call them monstrous—were of a character to which the House could not agree.

MR. VANCE complained of the manner in which Irish business was carried on in that House. He instanced the Transfer of Lands Bill, which had been nineteen times set down for second reading, and on all occasions had come on after twelve o'clock at night. There was the Burial Bill, which had reached the Committee stage, and had been set down sixteen times, and had never come on till twelve at night. In the same way the Juries Bill had been set down nineteen times for second reading. If the right hon. Gentleman would at an early period of the next Session give a few days exclusively to Irish business, it would give more satisfaction to Irish Members.

MR. L. HEYWORTH bore testimony to the good feeling and the respect towards this country which he had found everywhere during his recent visit to the United States.

MR. LOWE said, that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Disraeli) had read a passage from the Speech from the Throne respecting an Amendment of the law of partnership. He had alluded to the Bill which he (Mr. Lowe) had introduced to amend that law, as a very inadequate attempt to redeem that pledge, and to his withdrawal of two Bills on the subject. This was quite true. The Bills did not redeem the pledge. But did not the right hon. Gentleman know that the Joint-stock Companies Act was only the Partnership Act under another name?—that it had redeemed the pledge to the very letter, and had passed a law of partnership in a better form than partnership existed in any part of the world, even in America. As to the Partnership Amendment Bill, it was true that he did withdraw in March the first Bill which he had introduced on the subject. It was because the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley), to whom the right hon. Gentleman seemed to have delegated the superintendence of his party in that House, had taken a formal exception to that Bill, that he had withdrawn it. He (Mr. Lowe) was not well versed in the forms of that House, and he therefore took it for granted that the objection was correct. He had then introduced another Bill, which had been read a third time; but the House introduced a clause which overthrew the principle on which the Bill was founded. He then certainly did in one sense abandon the Bill, but he abandoned it because he was defeated upon it—not in the sense intended by the right hon. Gentleman. He had said, again, that he had abandoned the Coalwhippers' Bill. Now, that Bill was given up because the coal owners came forward and said that they would do all that was required of them—which was merely not to pay their men in public-houses—without an Act of Parliament. They had accepted the pledge of those gentlemen, and withdrawn the Bill. He hoped, therefore, that when the right hon. Gentleman next made out an account against him that he would omit those three Bills from the list.

AUSTRALIAN MAIL PACKET SERVICE.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE, advertising to the contract recently concluded by the Government for postal communication with Australia, complained that it must necessarily fail in the essential points of the communication, inasmuch as its terms were such as could not possibly be performed. The contractors undertook to perform the voyage outwards in thirty-nine days, and the voyage inwards in thirty-five days; and, in order to do that, their vessels must proceed at an average rate of from ten and a half to eleven knots an hour. The utmost speed, however, of their present vessels was nine and three quarters knots, and, therefore, it was impossible for them to complete the voyage in these periods of time. What cast suspicion over the transaction was, that tenders at a cheaper rate, and, he thought, of a superior description, had been sent in by other parties. He might be told that the contractors were liable to a penalty of £100 per day if they failed to perform the distance in the given time, but it was a notorious fact that they could well afford to pay such a penalty out of the surplus profits which would accrue to them under the contract. On the whole, he thought that the prospects of the colony, with regard to postal communication with England, were worse than ever under this new arrangement.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY expressed his regret at the absence of the Postmaster General, but said, that, as far as he was informed, he believed the penalties were sufficient to insure the performance of the contract, and that power was reserved by the Government to break the contract at any period, if it were carried out in an unsatisfactory manner. He understood that the thirty-nine days meant from Suez to Australia, and as very recently a sailing vessel had accomplished the whole distance in fifty-nine days, he thought it was very probable that, with the assistance of steam, the contractors might complete the voyage in a satisfactory manner in fifty days, including the passage from England to Suez.

THE BISHOPS OF LONDON AND DURHAM RETIREMENT BILL.

Commons Amendments considered (according to Order).

On the Motion that the said Amendments be agreed to.

LORD REDESDALE said, his objections to the Bill were not removed by the Amendment which had been inserted in the Preamble by the other House. He was still of opinion that the resignation of the Bishops was a resignation for a consideration, and as such was illegal.

VISCOUNT DUNGANNON looked upon the Bill as most pernicious and dangerous to the interests of the Church.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY defended the Bill, which, he said, was most wholesome, and would be of the greatest advantage to the Church and to the dioceses affected. He looked back with the utmost satisfaction to the share which he had had in passing this Bill.

Lord DENMAN and the Duke of BUCLEUCH reiterated their objections to the Bill.

Motion agreed to.

THE PEERAGE.

LORD REDESDALE, adverting to a statement which had been made in one of the morning journals, that Her Majesty had been pleased to raise a right hon. Gentleman to the peerage by the title of Lord Kingston, complained generally of the practice which, he said, had been growing up of late years of conferring titles upon individuals raised to the peerage which were already held by Members of their Lordships' House.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that the noble Lord's remark was in this instance founded on a mistake. Lord Kingston was not the title which was to be borne by the Gentleman alluded to, but Lord Belper. With regard to the general question, the noble Lord must remember that titles were distinguished from each other by being described of such and such a place. For instance—the noble and learned Lord on the cross bench bore the title of Lord Wensleydale of Wensleydale, and also of Lord Wensleydale of Walton. The President of the Board of Trade was Lord Stanley of Alderley; and there were numberless similar instances in the peerage.

LEASES AND SALES OF SETTLED ESTATES—HAMPSTEAD HEATH.

Returned from the Commons with the Amendment which the Lords disagreed to, insisted upon, with the Commons' Reasons.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR moved that their Lordships do not insist upon disagreeing to the Commons' Amendments to this Bill. The principal Amendment was the introduction of a clause which would prevent Sir Thomas Wilson, Baronet, building upon Hampstead Heath, but which was general in its operation, and would apply to all persons similarly situated. It provided that the Court of Chancery should not be at liberty to give relief to any person who had already applied to Parliament for such relief, and been refused; and the principle upon which the Commons supported this Amendment was, that no judicial power or authority created by Parliament ought to have a retrospective operation, and that the Court of Chancery ought not to be invested with powers for the purpose of reviewing the past decisions of the Houses of Parliament. He would move not to insist upon the disagreement to the said Amendment.

LORD REDESDALE observed that on the previous evening their Lordships had divided on the clause introduced by the Commons to prevent Sir Thomas Wilson from exercising the ordinary power which this Act conferred upon all other tenants for life. The numbers were equal, and consequently the Amendments were sent back not agreed to. However, on that day, the House of Commons had, by vote, insisted on their Amendments, notwithstanding the result of the division in their Lordships' House. He still believed the clause in question to be a very objectionable one.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY said, that Sir Thomas Wilson only came under the general principle of this clause, which appeared to him to be a very just one.

On Question, not to insist, their Lordships divided:—Content 10; Not Content 6: Majority 4.

Motion agreed to; and a message sent to the Commons to acquaint them therewith.

House adjourned to Tuesday next.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Saturday, July 26, 1856.

LEASES AND SALES OF SETTLED ESTATES BILL.—(HAMPSTEAD HEATH).

Order of the Day for the consideration of the Lords' Reasons for disagreeing to the Commons' Amendment read.

LORD ROBERT GROSVENOR said, he rose to move that the House insist on the Amendments made by them in the Bill, and which had been struck out by the Lords. He thought it was unreasonable of the Lords to ask the Commons to give up their opinion on a matter respecting which opinion was equally divided in the Upper House, as had been shown by the division which had taken place on the matter in the Upper House on the previous evening. A clause introduced by the Commons, and to which the House of Commons and the inhabitants of the metropolis attached very great importance (the clause relating to Hampstead Heath), had been struck out by the Lords. Now, viewing this matter as one of very great importance, he should move that the Commons insist on the Amendments made by them, and that a Committee be appointed to draw up a statement of the reasons which had induced the House to adopt his Motion.

Resolved, That this House doth insist on the said Amendment.

Committee appointed, "to draw up Reasons to be assigned to the Lords for insisting on the said Amendment:"—Lord ROBERT GROSVENOR, Sir JOHN SHELLEY, Mr. SOLICITOR GENERAL, Mr. GREENE, Mr. MASSEY, and Mr. HADFIELD:—To withdraw immediately; Three to be the quorum.

Reasons for insisting on Commons Amendment reported and agreed to:—To be communicated to the Lords, with Bill and Amendments.

BISHOPS—(SCOTLAND).

MR. GLADSTONE said, he rose, pursuant to notice, to call the attention of the House to the recent announcement, by Her Majesty's Government, of their intention to discontinue an allowance heretofore made to the Bishops of the Episcopal Communion in Scotland, and to the legal disabilities, not applicable to the ministers of any other religious denomination in this country, to which the said

Bishops and their clergy were subjected in common with the Episcopal Clergy of the United States of America; and to move for copies or extracts of any correspondence relating to the subject. At that period of the Session he would not enter into any detailed discussion upon the subject, but he was desirous briefly to make known to the House a very extraordinary state of facts, which, in his opinion, obviously called for the intervention of the Legislature. The case of the Scotch Episcopal Church was rather a peculiar one. It was a relic, if he might so call it, of what was once a National Establishment, which practised and adhered to the reformed religion. On account of its political connection with the fortunes of the Stuarts, it was, during the last century, subjected to the operation of prospective laws, more severe and more effective than any other laws of a similar character which were at that time in operation. The peculiarity of those laws was, that they did not touch the laity of the communion, but struck at once at its organised body of officers, and were directed positively and absolutely against their officiating to anything which could be called a congregation. Their doing so was prohibited under penalties, beginning with fine and imprisonment, and ending with transportation. Towards the close of the last century, and shortly before the beginning of the revolutionary war, when there was no longer danger from the Stuarts, Mr. Pitt introduced into Parliament a measure for the repeal of those laws. Lord Thurlow, who was then Lord Chancellor, had never heard of Scottish Bishops; he apparently regarded them as specimens of a bygone race which had been disinterred from beneath the soil, and was very apprehensive of the consequences of reviving this antiquated species, and calling it back to the world of animated life. He therefore procured the insertion in this Act of Parliament of a clause which provided that, although these persons might exercise their offices according to their consciences in Scotland, under no circumstances should they be allowed to officiate in England. Now this legislation was of the most absurd character, because Ireland was not included, and might, if there had been any disposition to occupy it, have been overrun with Scottish Bishops and clergy. Since that time the Sovereigns of the House of Hanover had felt that these Bishops of the Episcopal Communion in Scotland, representing something of an historical religion, and being freed from all imputation of disloyalty, were entitled to certain marks of Royal consideration. These had been bestowed upon them at various times and by various Sovereigns, particularly by George IV., who, when he visited Scotland, about the year 1822 gave them a substantial mark of his favour in the shape of a small Treasury grant, the amount of which was at first £1,200 every two years, but which was afterwards converted into an annual grant of £600. His (Mr. Gladstone's) hon. Friend the Secretary of the Treasury (Mr. Wilson) recently stated that it had been determined to withdraw that grant which had never been placed upon the Estimates, but had for something like thirty years been paid out of the Vote for Civil Contingencies, as a part of which it had annually been brought under discussion, and to which opposition had been raised by some hon. Members on the ground that it was of the nature of a State preference of a particular denomination. Now, he did not pretend to say that it would be expedient to give a permanent character to this grant. His only complaint was, that it ought not to have been suddenly withdrawn, but ought, according to the precedent set by Lord Derby when Secretary of State under Lord Grey's Administration, in the case of the North American provinces, to have been continued for the lives of the persons who had received it. Their incomes were exceedingly narrow, and the House ought not to disappoint individual expectations reasonably entertained, or to depart from its ordinary liberal rules in the case of any particular class. He therefore did not preclude himself from raising, on some future occasion, the question, whether it would not be consistent with the rules and practice of that House to continue this small allowance for the lives of those persons who had been in the actual receipt of it. That, however, was a minor question. To the withdrawal of the grant in principle he made no objection; indeed, at the time that he was Chancellor of the Exchequer, he stated, in reply to an application that measures might be taken to make this grant permanent, that he could give no encouragement to any such proposal. What he now, however, wanted to bring under the consideration of the Government and of the House was the extraordinary burden of disability under which the Bishops and clergy of the Scottish Episcopal Communion now laboured. There were at this moment on our Statute Book proscriptive laws against the holding of cures of souls or benefices in England against two limited bodies of men only. It might be expected that the subjects of these prohibitions were Mormonites or professors of some hideous and unheard-of form of religion; but such was not the case. They were, on the contrary, the members of the two religious communions with which on questions of doctrine and discipline the Church of England stood in the most immediate relation of agreement. They were the Protestant Episcopal Communities of Scotland, and of the United States, which sprung from the loins of the Church of England respectively in the 17th and 18th centuries. The ministers of any other religion might, by fulfilling the proper legal conditions, qualify themselves for the ministry of the Church of England. Any Member of the House of Commons might qualify himself, be ordained, and become a minister of that Church. Any Roman Catholic priest was, by his orders, qualified to present himself for ordination. Any priest of the Greek or Eastern church, any priest, minister, or layman of any Christian denomination whatever, any Mahomedan, any Hindoo, any Kafir, any Hottentot, upon complying with certain rules, might be presented to a benefice in the Church of England; but the unfortunate minister of the Episcopal Communion in Scotland and of the Protestant Episcopal Church in America could not, as the law now stood, by any possibility, hold a cure of souls or a benefice in that Church. To make the matter still more ridiculous, this disability was founded on no spiritual incompetency, because the competency of those persons had been fully recognised by a recent Act of Parliament, which allowed the ministers of those two communities to administer in England, with the licence of a Bishop, all the most sacred offices of the Church. They might preach, baptize, offer prayers, celebrate the Eucharist, and, if Bishops, confirm and ordain, and do all other things which were within the episcopal functions: yet we committed the absurdity of saying that, in no case should they hold a cure of souls. Now, that was a state of the law which he maintained required alteration, and the moment at which the last mark of temporal consideration for those persons had been withdrawn was, he considered, a most appropriate time for making such an alteration. He hoped, therefore, that his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, whom he saw in his place, would yield to the fairness of the claim, and would admit that this was a most invidious proscription, and one to which an end ought to be put. He was quite ready to admit that it might not be wise simply to repeal those laws without making some provision to prevent improper persons resorting to Scotland or America for ordination with a view to holding benefices in England. The agreement of those communities with the Church of England was a reason why Parliament should take security against the abuse of any facilities for ordination which might exist in those countries. He did not imagine that there would be any such facilities, because he believed that with regard to ordination the Scottish Bishops were quite as strict as the English ones—indeed stricter, he apprehended, than some of the more lenient of the latter Prelates. Still he considered that there was a fair ground for making special rules, such as that according to which a clergyman ordained by a Bishop of the Colonial Church could not hold a benefice in England without the consent of the Bishop of the diocese, and also of the Archbishop of the province. The existing prohibition was monstrous, and quite at variance with the spirit of modern legislation; and he was, therefore, sanguine that his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the other Members of the Government would take a view of it similar to his own, and would speedily introduce into Parliament a Bill for its abrogation.

MR. BLACK said, that he was by no means favourable to Parliamentary grants for religious purposes, deeming the principle both vicious and unconstitutional, but at the same time he was unwilling that an act of injustice should be done to any party, and he thought it rather hard that the Episcopal Communion in Scotland should be singled out for more severe treatment than was awarded to any other class of religionists. The Scottish recipients of this small bounty were fairly entitled to expect that, as it had been granted to them for thirty consecutive years, it would be continued for their lifetime. They were gentlemen of exemplary piety, between whom and the Apostles there was at least one point of resemblance—poverty. The legislative disabilities under which they laboured were a disgrace to modern civilisation, and a reproach to the statute book.

MR. PELLATT said, he thought that the improvements suggested by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. Gladstone) should emanate from the Church and not from the Legislature.

MR. DUNCAN said, he hoped the Government would consider the matter, for the present state of the law was disgraceful. He trusted that the working clergy would be looked to as well as the Bishops.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he was not aware of the existence of the disqualifications to which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford had referred, nor could he conceive what rational argument could be urged in their favour. [MR. GLADSTONE: They were introduced by Lord Thurlow in a Bill passed in 1792.] It scarcely needed the logical and forensic diction of the right hon. Gentleman to display the absurdity and illiberality of such regulations. However, as they existed by virtue of an Act of Parliament, it would need the interference of the Legislature to remove them, and it would not be competent for the Church to do so by its own action. There was no difference between the religious tenets of the Episcopal Communion in Scotland and those of the Established Church in this country. Each subscribed to the Thirty-nine Articles, and though there might be some distinction in their liturgies, there was none in their doctrinal opinions. Whatever the opinion of Lord Thurlow, who was no great theologian, might have been on this question, it was very certain that these disqualifications, affecting one of two classes of religionists which were precisely identical in faith, were entirely irrational. The present seemed a gracious moment to revoke them, when the Government had found itself compelled by a sense of public duty to take away the small grant heretofore enjoyed by the Episcopal Communion in Scotland. It was with great reluctance that the Government had done so; but there were reasons which, in their view, rendered it imperative to take the step. The grant had been usually made once in two years. Previous to the surrender by the Crown of the hereditary revenues, which took place on the accession of William IV., the charge was defrayed from that source of income, but it had since that period been defrayed from the Vote for Civil Contingencies, there being now no fund at the disposal of the Crown to meet charges of that description. The first grant appeared to have been made in 1813, by a Treasury Minute, dated the 28th of December in that year, upon a representation from the Protestant Bishops in Scotland of the inadequacy of the incomes of many of the Episcopal clergy, which had been reduced in some cases to £20 a year. The grant was again made in 1815, but did not appear to have been paid regularly until 1828. From that date £1,200 had been paid once in two years. The hereditary revenue having been surrendered to the public, the grant must now be provided for from public funds. The annual sums of £2,000 for the poor clergy of the Scotch Presbyterian Church, and of £1,100 for the officers of the General Assembly managing the affairs of that Church, were payable from the Consolidated Fund under the Act of 2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 116, passed for the purpose of giving effect to the recommendations of the Committee on Civil Government Charges in 1831. The charge for the Episcopal clergy was not included in the items mentioned in the Report of the Committee, but no doubt it would have been provided for in like manner had it been adverted to at the time as likely to become a permanent charge. The sum was divided in proportions of £100 to each of the six Bishops, and the remainder among the inferior clergy according to the discretion of the trustees, subject to the limit of £80 as the maximum of the emolument of each. It having been represented that the funds at the disposal of the Government for Civil Contingencies could not with propriety be applied to such purposes as the grant contemplated, the Government had to decide whether they would place it on the annual Votes or discontinue it altogether. Looking at all the circumstances of the case, and having particular regard to the fact that the Episcopal Church in Scotland was upon the whole a wealthy communion, its resources being considerable, and its numbers not greater than those of a large London parish; and remembering, also, that in Scotland they were Nonconformists, the Government came to the conclusion that it would not be advisable to place the grant on the annual Votes, and that the latter alternative—that of abolishing it altogether—was the only one that could be adopted. The Government had arrived at that determination with considerable reluctance, but they had not felt justified in taking any other course.

MR. THOMPSON said, he approved the conduct of the Government in withdrawing the grant; but he would submit that the legal disqualifications to which its former recipients were liable ought also to be removed.

Motion agreed to.

MR. CONSUL MATHEW—EXPLANATION.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he begged to ask the permission of the House to make a brief personal explanation with respect to a gentleman who undeservedly, as regarded himself, had been a sufferer on public grounds. He alluded to Mr. Mathew, who had lately held the office of British Consul in America, but from whom his exequatur had been withdrawn on the charge that he had been implicated in breaches of the American law in matters relating to the enlistment question. The proceedings of Mr. Consul Mathew had been taken in the most direct and straightforward manner. He had reported all that he had done to his official superior, Mr. Crampton; that gentleman had, in his turn, reported his proceedings to the Government, by whom they were sanctioned and approved. It was clear, therefore, that, whatever might be thought of the merits of the general question, no blame could fairly attach to Mr. Consul Mathew. The responsibility of his proceedings, if they constituted a breach of the American law, was transferred to his superiors, and if he had gone wrong he had done so in his zeal for his country, and in his earnest desire to carry into effect the instructions of those who were in authority over him. In acquainting them with the course he had taken, and in procuring their approval of it, he had placed himself beyond the possibility of offence, but, unfortunately, as it appeared, not of punishment. He was undeservedly a sufferer, and he (Mr. Gladstone) considered him to be well entitled to the consideration of the English Government. He had been given to understand, however, that in the course of the debate on the enlistment question words were imputed to him (Mr. Gladstone) to the effect that he was not disposed to give entire credence to the statements of Mr. Consul Mathew. If any such words had indeed been attributed to him, all he could say was that they had been erroneously attributed, for, in point of fact, he gave the fullest credence to the statements of that gentleman, whom he believed to be an honourable and well-intentioned man.

THE ROSS-SHIRE RIFLES.

On the Motion, "That the House at its rising do adjourn till Tuesday."

THE EARL OF DALKEITH said, he wished to call the attention of the House to the case of Captain Frazer, late adjutant of the Ross-shire militia. Having regard to the late period of the Session, and to the circumstance that the Under Secretary for War was not in his place, he should not go into the details of the subject, but would reserve to himself the right of bringing it under the consideration of the House early next Session. At present he would merely observe that Captain Frazer appeared to have been treated with singular severity in having been deprived of his commission in the Ross-shire Rifles by the Secretary for War, on account of some alleged neglect with reference to a certain correspondence on the subject of some transactions which had occurred in the Highland regiment, in which he had been an officer previously to his connection with the Ross-shire Rifles. The Secretary for War had taken this power into his own hands, contrary to the opinion of the Judge Advocate, who, when the whole case was referred to him, stated that if a court-martial had been granted its extreme sentence would have been a reprimand.

GENERAL BEATSON.

MR. ROEBUCK said, that on the night of the 22nd instant both the noble Lord at the head of the Government and the Under Secretary for War (Mr. F. Peel) stated that the proceedings against General Beatson were continuing; that the charges were, in fact, at that very time held over his head. On the following morning, that of the 23rd of July, General Beatson received a letter acquitting him of all the charges which had been made against him. Had the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Peel) been in his place he (Mr. Roebuck) should have put to him this question—"Seeing that your acquittal was passed in consequence of your having had in your possession for at least one fortnight documentary evidence respecting the charges against General Beatson, did you at the time that you made the declaration, that the charge was still hanging over his head, contemplate writing the letter of the 23rd? If you did, you misled the House by that statement, and any statement you may hereafter make must be taken with the consideration that you made such a statement."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he apprehended that it was not competent for the noble Lord (Lord Dalkeith) to make a Motion on the question of adjournment. His hon. Friend the Under Secretary for War would be in his place on Tuesday and would then give any explanation that might be required. He would no doubt, on the same day, answer the question of the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield.

Motion for the adjournment of the House till Tuesday agreed to.

PENSIONS—EXPLANATION.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he wished to give an explanation with reference to certain small pensions originally chargeable on the Civil List, to which the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck) had called attention the other evening, but it was a mistake to suppose that when those pensions were transferred from the Civil List to the Consolidated Fund, Government had made any profit on the difference between the nominal grant, as at first regulated, and the actual payment subsequently made. Pensions originally chargeable on the Civil List were liable, while thus circumstanced, to certain deductions in the nature of fees and taxes, but when, on the succession of Her Majesty those pensions were transferred to the Consolidated Fund, the net amount was paid to the recipients. The public gained nothing, nor did the recipients lose anything by the operation.

The House adjourned at Two o'clock till Tuesday next.

PROROGATION OF THE PARLIAMENT—
SPEECH OF THE LORDS COMMISSIONERS.

The PARLIAMENT was this day prorogued by Commission.

THE LORDS COMMISSIONERS, namely, the Lord Chancellor (Lord CRANWORTH), the Lord Privy Seal (the Earl of HARROWBY), the President of the Board of Trade (Lord STANLEY of ALDERLEY), the Lord WILLOUGHBY D'ERESBY, and the Lord MONT-EAGLE, being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the COMMONS preceded by their Speaker being present, the ROYAL ASSENT was given to several Bills.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, on behalf of the LORDS COMMISSIONERS, then delivered the following Speech:—

My Lords, and Gentlemen,

“WE are commanded by Her Majesty to release you from further Attendance in Parliament, and at the same Time to express to you Her warm Acknowledgments for the Zeal and Assiduity with which you have applied yourselves to the Discharge of your Public Duties during the Session.

“WHEN Her Majesty met you in Parliament at the Opening of the Session Her Majesty was engaged, in Co-operation with Her Allies, The Emperor of the French, The King of Sardinia, and The Sultan, in an arduous War, having for its Object Matters of high European Importance; and Her Majesty appealed to your Loyalty and Patriotism for the necessary Means to carry on that War with the Energy and Vigour essential to Success.

“You answered nobly the Appeal then made to you; and Her Majesty was enabled to prepare for the Operations of the expected Campaign Naval and Military Forces worthy of the Power and Reputation of this Country.

“HAPPILY it became unnecessary to apply those Forces to the Purposes for which they had been destined. A Treaty was concluded by which the Objects for which the War had been undertaken were fully attained; and an honourable Peace has saved Europe from the Calamities of continued Warfare.

“HER MAJESTY trusts that the Benefits resulting from that Peace will be extensive and permanent; and that while the Friendships and Alliances which were cemented by common Exertions during the Contest will gain Strength by mutual Interests in Peace, those Asperities which inherently belong to Conflict will give place to the Confidence and Goodwill with which a faithful Execution of Engagements will inspire those who have learnt to respect each other as Antagonists.

“HER MAJESTY commands us to thank you for your Support in the Hour of Trial, and to express to you Her fervent Hope that the Prosperity of Her faithful People, which was not materially checked by the Pressure of War, may continue and be increased by the genial Influence of Peace.

"HER MAJESTY is engaged in Negotiations on the Subject of Questions in connection with the Affairs of Central America; and Her Majesty hopes that the Differences which have arisen on those Matters between Her Majesty's Government and that of the United States may be satisfactorily adjusted.

"WE are commanded by Her Majesty to inform you that Her Majesty desires to avail Herself of this Occasion to express the Pleasure which it afforded Her to receive during the War in which She has been engaged numerous and honourable Proofs of Loyalty and Public Spirit from Her Majesty's Indian Territories, and from those Colonial Possessions which constitute so valuable and important a Part of the Dominions of Her Majesty's Crown.

"HER MAJESTY has given Her cordial Assent to the Act for rendering more effectual the Police in Counties and Boroughs in England and Wales. This Act will materially add to the Security of Person and Property, and will thus afford increased Encouragement to the Exertions of honest Industry.

"HER MAJESTY rejoices to think that the Act for the Improvement of the internal Arrangements of the University of Cambridge will give fresh Powers of Usefulness to that ancient and renowned Seat of Learning.

"THE Act for regulating Joint-stock Companies will afford additional Facilities for the advantageous Employment of Capital, and will thus tend to promote the Development of the Resources of the Country; while the Acts passed relative to the Mercantile Laws of England and of Scotland will diminish the Inconvenience which the Differences of those Laws occasion to Her Majesty's Subjects engaged in Trade.

"HER MAJESTY has seen with satisfaction that you have given your Attention to the Arrangements connected with County Courts. It is Her Majesty's anxious Wish that Justice should be attainable by all Classes of Her Subjects with as much Speed and with as little Expense as may be consistent with the due Investigation of the Merits of Causes to be tried.

"HER MAJESTY trusts that the Act for placing the Coast-Guard under the Direction of the Board of Admiralty will afford the Groundwork for Arrangements for providing, in Time of Peace, Means applicable to National Defence on the Occurrence of any future Emergency.

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

"WE are commanded by Her Majesty to thank you for the Readiness with which you have granted the Supplies for the present Year.

"My Lords, and Gentlemen,

"HER MAJESTY commands us to congratulate you on the favourable State of the Revenue, and upon the thriving Condition of all Branches of the National Industry; and She acknowledges with Gratitude the Loyalty of Her faithful Subjects, and that Spirit of Order and that Respect for the Law which prevail in every Part of Her Dominions.

"HER MAJESTY commands us to express Her Confidence that on your Return to your Homes you will promote, by your Influence and Example, in your several Districts, that continued and progressive Improvement which is the vital Principle of the Well-being of Nations; and Her Majesty fervently prays that the Blessing of Almighty God may attend your Steps, and prosper your Doings for the Welfare and Happiness of Her People."

Then a Commission for proroguing the Parliament was read.

After which

The LORD CHANCELLOR said—

"MY LORDS, AND GENTLEMEN,

"By virtue of Her Majesty's Commission, under the Great Seal, to us and other Lords directed, and now read, we do, in Her Majesty's Name, and in obedience to Her Commands, prorogue this Parliament to Tuesday the Seventh Day of October next, to be then here holden; and this Parliament is accordingly prorogued to Tuesday the Seventh Day of October next."

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, July 29, 1856.

MINUTE.] NEW MEMBER SWORN.—For County of Dorset, Henry Gerard Sturt, esq.

THE LEITRIM MILITIA—QUESTION.

MR. BRADY said, he would beg to ask the hon. Under Secretary for War why the staff of the Leitrim Militia was not to be quartered in the county town in accordance with the recommendation of the Lord Lieutenant of the county?

MR. FREDERICK PEEL said, that the arrangements respecting the staff of the Irish Militia rested with the Irish Government. There had not been any correspondence on the subject with the War Department.

MR. BRADY said, he would then beg to address his question to the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland.

MR. HORSMAN said, that, not having any notice of the question, he was unable to answer it.

ARMY WORKS CORPS—QUESTION.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, he wished to put a question to the hon. Under Secretary for War. Considerable dissatisfaction had been felt by the men of the Army Works Corps because they did not receive a printed discharge on their return to this country. That omission had, however, been repaired by a subsequent arrangement; and he now wished to ask the hon. Gentleman whether the claim made by the men to pay from the date of their landing up to the receipt of their discharge would be taken into the early consideration of the Government?

MR. FREDERICK PEEL said, he was informed that the great body of the men had been settled with on their arrival, and had returned to their homes perfectly satisfied; but a small number had moved this question relative to the sums to which they supposed they were entitled. There could be no doubt their discharge dated from the period of their arrival in this country, and they would therefore all be paid up to that time, but they were not entitled to anything more.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, he wished the Government to consider that these men, not having been discharged, were unable to obtain employment elsewhere. They wished to be placed on the same footing as the militia. The number that had brought forward this grievance was not so small as the hon. Gentleman seemed to suppose. It was above 400 men. He would ask if the Government would take the case into their consideration at an early moment?

SIR JOSEPH PAXTON said, that he had investigated almost every one of the claims that had been made; and in every case he had found that the statement about their not being able to obtain employment elsewhere was groundless. In not one case had there been the least difficulty through their not having a written discharge. The terms upon which they had been engaged were that they should have a free passage to this country, and on arriving here should receive a gratuity. They had received their gratuity, and had given a written receipt for it; and the men had all been dealt with according to the original arrangement.

FRENCH DECORATIONS—QUESTION.

COLONEL NORTH said, he wished to ask the hon. Under Secretary for War if there was any objection to lay upon the table the documents bearing the names of the British officers and soldiers upon whom the medals granted by the Emperor of the French had been conferred.

MR. FREDERICK PEEL said, there would be no objection to lay those documents upon the table.

CASE OF GENERAL BEATSON—
QUESTION.

MR. ROEBUCK: I rise, Sir, to put a question of which I gave notice on Saturday. The House will recollect that both the noble Lord at the head of the Government and the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for War stated the other night that the inquiry into the conduct of General Beatson was still pending, and that the House ought therefore to abstain from expressing any opinion on the subject. On the day after that statement was made, the 23rd of July, a letter was written by the Government to General Beatson, based upon documents which had been in the possession of the War Department a fortnight before, and giving a full acquittal to that officer. I wish to ask the noble Lord whether he was aware of those documents when he addressed the House the other night? I suppose he only spoke the words that had been set down for him. That excuse cannot, however, apply to the hon. Gentleman (Mr. F. Peel), who must have had cognisance of the documents when he made his statement to the House.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, the circumstance to which the hon. and learned Gentleman alludes only shows the bad results attending the interposition of hon. Members, at the instigation of persons not in this House, upon matters which are still under the consideration of Government, and have not yet been made the subject of action. I practised no deception on the House. I was quite aware that this question had been considered by my noble Friend at the head of the War Department; and I stated the other night, as distinctly as I could, that in a very few days a decision would be come to by the Government and a communication made to General Beatson. I did not think it proper then to inform either the hon. and learned Member or the House what would be the decision on this matter at which the Government were likely to arrive. If any inconvenience has arisen it is owing, therefore, to the impatient haste of the hon. and learned Gentleman, acting on a suggestion of General Beatson, on a question that was pending elsewhere. Of course, until the decision had been definitively taken, and regularly communicated to the gallant officer concerned, it might have been liable to a change in the event of certain circumstances being brought to the knowledge of my noble Friend.

MR. FREDERICK PEEL said, he would only add to the statement just made by his noble Friend, that in answering the speech of the hon. and gallant Member for Portarlington (Colonel Dunne) on a previous evening, he (Mr. F. Peel) said, in substance, that although the correspondence had not been completed, yet the communications received by the Government did not support the charges made against General Beatson.

MR. ROEBUCK: The hon. Gentleman said that the inquiry was still pending.

MR. FREDERICK PEEL: I made use of no such an expression.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he would give notice, that early next Session he should call the attention of the House to the manner in which officers in the army were put upon their trial on the most serious charges, without receiving any previous notice of the accusations brought against them. That practice was one deeply affecting the honour and discipline of the army, and must touch the feelings of every soldier.

COLONEL FRENCH said, he should be glad to know whether, now that the inquiry in General Beatson's case was concluded, the noble Lord at the head of the Government had any objection to mention the name of the gallant officer's accuser?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, I do not know from whom General Shirley received the information which he communicated to General Vivian, and which the latter sent home to my noble Friend at the head of the War Department; nor am I aware that my noble Friend knows their names either. One officer whose name has been mentioned in connection with this matter is Colonel O'Reilly—a man of perfect honour and the highest integrity, who was distinguished for his ardent desire to improve himself in his profession, and who with that view served as a volunteer in the Sardinian army, and also in the armies of other countries. He afterwards went to Turkey, where he was appointed to the command of the Turkish cavalry. As far as anything communicated by General Shirley originated with Colonel O'Reilly, I am confident, therefore, that the latter stated only what he believed to be strictly correct.

SIR CHARLES BURRELL said, he thought the proceedings instituted against General Beatson, whose accuser was allowed to remain anonymous, were extremely harsh, and contrary to the spirit of the law of England.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, while General Beatson was in England the parties from whom the information came were at Schumla, and afterwards at Kertch. The inquiry ordered by my noble Friend was merely a preliminary one, to see whether further steps were necessary.

SMITHFIELD—QUESTION.

VISCOUNT RAYNHAM said, he would beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, as Smithfield could not again be converted into a cattle-market, there was any objection to the immediate removal of all the pens and barriers remaining there, so as to enable it to become a place of recreation for the inhabitants of that crowded locality?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that no doubt Smithfield was in its present state very unsightly, and also somewhat inconvenient. There were difficulties, however, which existed as to the ownership of the site; and it was impossible, under any circumstances, to appropriate it without an Act of Parliament. If the railings were now to be removed, there would be a large open space left, which it would be difficult to keep in proper order.

THE CRIMEAN INQUIRY—QUESTION.

COLONEL NORTH said, the Report recently laid on the table with reference to the condition of the army in the Crimea attributed many of the disasters which took place to the want of forage, he wished to know whether it was the intention of Her Majesty's Government to take any notice of the very gross neglect which had been exhibited by Sir Charles Trevelyan, who was at the head of the department responsible for such supplies?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON replied, that Sir Charles Trevelyan was not examined before the Board of General Officers, and he had not an opportunity of making any statement as to the course pursued by the Treasury. Sir Charles Trevelyan was only the organ of the Treasury, but of course an opportunity would be afforded him, as an executive officer of the department, of giving any explanation he might think necessary.

COLONEL NORTH said, that he would take an early opportunity, in the next Session of Parliament, of bringing the subject under the consideration of the House. Sir Charles Trevelyan had positively refused to attend the Board, and had issued a pamphlet containing statements which in his (Colonel North's) opinion, were most disrespectful to the Board.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that Sir Charles Trevelyan had sent in a written statement to the Board of General Officers, but, inasmuch as neither his conduct individually, nor the conduct of the Treasury, was referred to the consideration of that Board, Sir Charles Trevelyan did not think it his duty to appear before the Board to give evidence. He (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) had been in communication with Sir Charles Trevelyan on the subject of the Crimean inquiry; and, with reference to the notice which had just been given by the hon. and gallant Member for Oxfordshire, he thought it right to state that Sir Charles Trevelyan disputed altogether the correctness of the conclusions at which the Board had arrived so far as the Treasury were concerned.

PROROGATION OF PARLIAMENT.

Message to attend the LORDS COMMISSIONERS. The House went; and the ROYAL ASSENT was given to several Bills. And a Speech of the LORDS COMMISSIONERS was delivered to both Houses afterwards by the LORD CHANCELLOR.

Then a Commission for proroguing the Parliament was read.

After which

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said;

“MY LORDS, AND GENTLEMEN,

“BY virtue of HER MAJESTY'S Commission, under the Great Seal, to us and other Lords directed, and now read, we do, in Her Majesty's Name and in obedience to Her Commands, prorogue this Parliament to Tuesday the 7th day of October next, to be then here holden; and this Parliament is accordingly prorogued to Tuesday the 7th day of October next.”
